suddenly sooo tired and have to go home. I saw on 20/20 where a French scientist stayed underground in a cave for four months. She lost all perception of time and didn't have any social norms to worry about. They monitored her vital signs and determined that she would sometimes stay awake for forty hours at a stretch.

Can you imagine life before clocks? You could show up for work in mid-afternoon. When the boss would give the evil eye, you would say, "Hey man (Yeah, they said "man" back then.) How do you know if I'm late? I woke up, then I ate, fed my mule and rode him to work. Traffic was heavy; the roads were full of asses." The bossman would say, "You're lucky that clocks haven't been invented yet. The minute someone invents an alarm clock, your ass is grass and I'm the sharp stick, Bozo." (Yeah, they called each other Bozo's then too.)

It would have been tough to wake up early back then--bars wouldn't know when it was two o'clock. (The good old days.)

It's funny how areas of the same country decide what "time" people should stop partying. And of course, we have four different time zones in America--Eastern, Central, Mountain, and bar time. Bar time is fifteen minutes fast.

No matter if we're drinking or reading--time passes exactly the same way on the clocks. Some people may use their time more wisely than others, but that is a matter of opinion, of course.

When I was living in Texas, it was commonplace to see illegal aliens from Mexico laying around on apartment steps all day--just shooting the breeze or whatever it is they shoot. I used to think that it was such a waste of time and a waste of crazy ones. What was I doing with my time? Working, going to school, fighting traffic, and for what? In hope of some day being able to sit around and do nothing. They actually achieved the American dream without even realizing it.

It's time to end this column before it gets too long. You can feel proud for spending your time wisely while reading this column. Now go on and waste all the rest of your time in which ever manner you choose. You're young--time is on your side.

Lady Hawks Edge A&T, American

BY TASHA ROONE
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

The women's basketball team returned from Greensboro victorious after pulling out a close one. Seahawks started off a little weak offensively yet were strong defensively.

Into eight minutes of the game the Hawks kept it close - if they made one we'd make one. First half with fifty seconds on the game clock Tressa Resse shoots one of her two three pointers to bring Hawks within two 23-25.

Just before time runs out Jennifer Bennett banks home two to put the Hawks in the lead of Lady Aggiettes at half-time 25-23.

Half-way during the second half the Hawks were up by ten points, with two from Denise Bailey, for a score of 48-38. Quite a lead Hawks! Lady Aggiettes tried to comeback; however, they always stayed about six points behind until the last twenty-six seconds. Paulette Dennis for Lady Aggiettes hit her second three pointer of the night allowing them to come within one point 59-60.

It's wild now; Lady Hawks are trying to hold on to their lead, and the Lady Aggiettes are trying to strip it away. Gina Bennett is fouled and she goes to the line for two shots. Under pressure Gina swishes two for a final score of 62-59.

Players with double figures were Kelly Kincaid - 17, Tressa Resse - 16 Charlene Page - 12 and lead rebounder Jennifer Bennett - 11.

Trask Coliseum played host to American University's Lady Eagles coached by Darci Wilson a graduate of UNC- Wilmington, who played underneath Marylin Christoph.

From the beginning the Eagles pressed the Seahawks to try and shut them out early on. First half Lady Eagles were leading Hawks for about fourteen minutes. The last six minutes the Hawks pulled out a lead for a half-time score of 39-32.

With two minutes and twenty-two seconds left the Hawks are up by five which they quickly lose. On the game clock reads 1:35 and it's a two point game.

Page is sent to the line for two only three seconds left. Another two is written in Page's book as she makes both free throws 72-70. Another foul is made by the Lady Eagles. (Desperation perhaps?) Gina goes to the line with one second to go - it's a one and one. Of course she makes them. Did you have a feeling of déjà vu Gina?

Lady Seahawks win it with a tight 73-70 final score. Lead scorer once again is Kelly Kincaid - 21. She is quite dominating with the backboard. Charlene Page is not far behind Kelly with 20 points. Tressa Resse didn't shoot double figures only hitting 9. However, she holds the position of lead rebounder pulling down 14.

Two close calls yet they do it. Perhaps it's one of their basketball tactics. Give the other team a chance to catch up, make them think they can win it and in the last few seconds snatch it from them. It makes the lost that much harder for the opposing team. Now that's interesting. Congratulations girls!

Tonight the Lady Seahawks will travel to South Carolina to play a non-conference game against Coastal Carolina, and on Saturday the Hawks will visit the Mingos Coliseum in Greenville to play the Lady Pirates of ECU. Good Luck!!

ROTC Program Working Scholarship Applications Up

(UNCW NEWS)--There are more scholarship applicants this year than ever before in the history of the ROTC program at The University of North Carolina at Wilmington, reports Captain Kris Frasure, UNCW ROTC scholarship coordinator.

"The quality of students that have applied is phenomenal! Across the board, they have strong grade point averages, are very active in the university and community, and present themselves very well," she said.

So far this year, 14 students have applied for the scholarships which pay for all tuition, fees, books, classroom supplies and graduation expenses.

"The best part about the program," Frasure adds, "is that our students are not competing with each other. They are competing nationwide."

Last year, eight UNCW freshmen applied for 3-year scholarships. Each student received a scholarship, some 3-year and some 2-year.

The scholarship process is relatively simple. A student fills out a scholarship application and is scheduled for an interview. At this interview, the student meets with members of the ROTC staff and representatives of the university who try to learn more about the applicant than can be evaluated using paperwork alone.

At this stage, Frasure takes over. "I assist the students in putting together as good a scholarship application packet as possible. I take a great deal of pride in knowing that I have helped these students and improved their chances of winning." Frasure points out that these scholarships are not restricted to current ROTC students. Any UNCW student may apply.

To be eligible and competitive, the student must graduate before reaching age 25, must have at least a 2.5 G.P.A. (the higher, the better), must pass a free physical health examination, and must have scored at least 850 on the S.A.T. When asked which criterion was most important, Frasure stated, "There is no one most important item. The Army is looking for well-rounded individuals. We think the students who are involved in extra-curricular and athletic activities and maintain a good solid G.P.A. have the potential to make excellent officers."

The ROTC Department is very pleased with the interest the students have shown. "It's not for everyone," Lt. Col. LeeRoy Hanna, Professor of Military Science, says, "but it does not hurt to come in and talk about it."

Mass Immunization Effort A Success

UNCW Measles Threat Neutralized

BY CHAD ADAMS
MANAGING EDITOR

In the aftermath of a potential measles epidemic, UNCW is settling back into routine after a well-organized mass immunization effort on the part of campus and county health officials.

"Over 2,000 students were immunized," said Dr. Kathleen Jewell, Director of the Health and Wellness Center. Close to 2700 letters were sent out last Thursday to students who either needed to be immunized or present proof of their immunization to the Health and Wellness Center.

"About 200 students remain to present proof of immunization to continue classes," said Jewell. Immunizations were provided by the County Health Department in Hanover Hall from January 27th through 29th. Further immunizations were provided in the University Union on January 30th and 31st.

The shots cost the Health Department $7 per immunization and were provided free of charge to the students, faculty and staff.

"State officials were impressed with the cooperation of the students at UNCW in comparison with other schools that they had worked with," said Jewell.

In response to the potential threat a letter was issued by Chancellor Wagoner forbidding students who had not been vaccinated from attending classes until they were able to present proof of immunization to the proper officials.

Some students were caught off guard by this measure as not all students were notified in their mail of their immunization status.

Karla Alston, SGA President, was among those not notified and was forced to miss classes on Tuesday when the measure went into effect.

"I was the only person in my 8 o'clock class affected," said Alston. "Several people I knew were unfortunate enough to have missed exams for not being notified."

Luckily, there were only a small number of students who were not notified and thus spent most of Tuesday making phone calls to family doctors in search of their immunization records.

SGA Senator Impeachments Proceeding

BY RICK HEYMANN
NEWS EDITOR

The Cape Fear Substance Abuse Center reports drug abuse among college aged people has dropped 10% since 1983, and has continued to drop every year. Yet, on a less positive note, a survey taken of 419 UNCW students in 1987 showed that 1 out of every 2 had used marijuana in the last 12 months and almost 1 out of every 5 had abused cocaine.

In light of the heavy amount of drugs used among college students, the LivWell Alternatives! Center is featuring a free, eight event program to heighten students' awareness of illegal drugs and their consequences during the week of February 6-10. Linda Longley, Program Development Specialist for the Alternatives! Center, mentioned, "We have been working hard on this program since last semester, but it is worth it."

To help with the planning of the week, there are ten students, some of whom are paid, that have worked long hours to organize the program.

Christi Godwin, a senior who helped plan the events, commented, "We have to attend to all the details; for example, arranging hotel reservations, reserving rooms and video equipment for the speakers etc. The whole program is a compilation of [these] details."

The Toastmasters club of UNCW and the N.C. Student Legislature will kick off the Drug Awareness Program with a debate in King Auditorium entitled, "Should Marijuana be Legalized?"

"We will be debating against the legalization. We are not primarily a debating club and have not debated against another club before," stated Sandra Adcox, Chairperson of the Toastmasters.

The winning organization will receive $100.

Fred McRee, AIDS Awareness Director of Wilmington, will present a lecture on Monday in the University Union concerning "AIDS and Drugs in the Black Community", co-sponsored by the Office of Minority Affairs.

McRee's speech will deal mainly with the AIDS issue in the black community. The drug aspect will take a back seat to the dreaded disease, but "The two go hand in hand when we speak of the black community," said McRee.

McRee believes that there exists socio-economic conditions in America that promote drug use and the spread of AIDS in the black community. "The media has not presented these issues in a light that the black community can understand. The poorer educated blacks just do not think that they are at risk," he said.

"This is McRee's second lecture concerning AIDS and drugs here at UNCW," said Ralph Parker, Director of Minority

Movie Review St. Johns Holds Hogan Display

"Tequila Sunrise", Action and Acting

BY ALLEN RAY
STAFF CRITIC

"Tequila Sunrise" is a fast paced, steamy love story that combines the talents of Michell Pfeifer, Kurt Russell, and Mel Gibson.

The story revolves around two life long friends who chose different paths. Russell's character became a police officer, while Mel Gibson's character became a drug smuggler after serving time in a Mexican prison when he was young.

An added strain is put on their friendship when Russell is promoted to the head of the drug enforcement division and is pressured to bust Gibson who has managed to avoid the police and his active smuggling career.

Michelle Pfeifer plays the beautiful owner of a restaurant and is the main love interest of Russell and Gibson. The problem for Pfeifer is to decide which one is sincere and which is using her. Smart dialogue, great acting, fast paced action make Tequila Sunrise a movie not to miss.

Talk Radio

This, the latest Oliver Stone film, stars Eric Bogosian as late night Dallas talk show host Gary Champlain. Champlain is a lonely, very unlikeable character who fields questions on every issue that his disturbed and often violent callers ask. The character of Champlain is very similar to that of former talk show host Alan Berg of Renner who was shot and killed by Neo Nazi's after one of his shows.

This film is practically a one man show with Bogosian dealing with one caller after another. The acting is very believable, but the film lacks a point and is too long.

(Arts Council Release)

One is struck by the form or composition of the drawings, prints and installations of North Carolina artist Kevin Hogan's work. However, further contemplation forces the viewer to deal with content.

Hogan's works are populated with the outlines of human figures which are headless, handless and footless. The work encompasses the themes of universal frailty, alienation and isolation.

Titles of Hogan's pieces, such as Local Disaster Series--Flood, Spill, and Dam Break Over Unknown Fault Line, 1988 (pictured), reinforce this theme. Hogan's site-specific installations utilize similar forms and content and came about with the artist's need to leave the two-dimensional surface of the wall and explore objects in "real" space. These three-dimensional works develop a spatial relationship and proximity to the viewer which is not achieved in drawings, paintings or prints.

Calligraphy Offered By Parks and Rec. Dept.

CPR Courses Offered

Four, six-hour CPR courses will be offered this semester for $10 (book included in cost). Classes will be taught in two, 3-hour sessions at the Residence Life Activity Center from 9:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. on each of the following days: Class 1-February 7 & 9; Class 2-February 21 & 23; Class 3-March 14 & 16 and Class 4-March 28 & 30. Call 395-3591 to schedule your training time.

Austrian Artists Display Jewelry

Two Austrian artists will display jewelry and glass vases Friday afternoon, February 3, at Sun Galleries in the Cotton Exchange.

Registration for Housing Lottery Upcoming

UNCW students who do not have guaranteed housing and wish to live on campus for the 1989-90 school year must register for the housing lottery. Students may sign up from 7:30 a.m. - 5 p.m., February 27 through March 3, in the housing office located on the first floor of Belk Hall. Students will be notified of the outcome via UNCW post office boxes following spring break. Results will also be posted in the residence halls/apartments, as soon as available.

Belgian Exchange Program

Interview dates for the June 29 Belgian exchange program sponsored by Citizens for Understanding will be conducted in February at the New Hanover County Library Conference Room on Tuesdays and Thursdays, February 7, 9, 14, 16, 21, 23, & 28 from 7-9 p.m.; and Sundays, February 12, 19 & 26 from 2-5 p.m. No appointment is necessary. A $25 application fee is required along with a completed application. For details call 458-7062 or 458-9472.

WLOZ Changing Formats

WLOZ, UNC-W's radio station and Wilmington's only alternative music source, is now back on the air from 4PM to 12AM, seven days a week. The frequency is 90.9 Cable-FM. Call 395-3086 for hook-up details. The station was also just allocated $500 for an engineered Frequency Search to locate a position on over-the-air FM. This is the first step in getting our radio station back on regular FM.

Director of Minority Affairs. He further mentioned that, "McRee is an outstanding historian and lecturer."

Parker explained it was not the purpose of Minority Affairs to be involved in Drug Awareness Week. "Not that we aren't interested in participating," he stressed, "But my primary intention was to get involved with the AIDS issue [in the black community]."

Tuesday's first event will feature veteran lecturer Mike Grimes, a Federal Drug Enforcement Agent. He commented that he has been speaking for "a long time" and he won't know the entire subject matter of his speech until he "relates to the audience."

One thing is for sure though; Grimes said he will discuss a 150 year history of drug abuse and how present day America can rid itself of drugs once and for all.

Grimes seems to feel that "we are a fat, lazy society bent on instant gratification." He believes that existing U.S. foreign policy and our inherent culture foster drug abuse in this country.

Tuesday night will be host to the week's most innovative event. A skit competition open to anyone affiliated with the university will offer a $100, $75, and $50 prize to the top three winners.

The skit must concern some aspect of drug abuse and be 5-10 minutes long. "Right now we only have 3 groups participating," said Longley. The judges will include Tony Rivenbark, Director of Thalian Hall, Dr. William Bryan, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, and L. Regina Lawson.

On Wednesday, the Alternatives! Center has organized a joint "Tye-dye sock throw" with the UNCW cheerleaders during halftime of the Richmond basketball game," said Longley. "We just thought this would be a different, sort of fun event for everyone. We have attached buttons with anti-drug statements to the socks," she said.

Sandy Errante will personally coordinate Thursday's events. A brown-bag lunch held by Errante will concern drug awareness directed specifically at the faculty.

Later that evening, a drug workshop aimed at children in Kindergarten through 3rd grade will be overseen by Errante as well.

Longley commented that this workshop will be presented in the form of games; maybe even a play concerning drug abuse using hand puppets.

Friday's only scheduled event, "The Big Band Swing Concert", will include a dance contest with music performed by UNCW's Jazz Ensemble at 8:00 pm in the Hawk's Nest. Refreshments will include "mocktails" (alcohol-free drinks) and food.

"We have children in grammar school who are abusing drugs," exclaimed Longley. Although this fact may seem extreme, this is exactly why we need the awareness program, she inferred. The realities of drug abuse often strike a crushing blow to the psyche of some, "But must be presented to save lives," said McRee.

The Office of Residence Life had to deal with the possibility of residents being forced out of their residence halls for not complying with the immunization order.

"There were only 29 students as of Monday who had not either presented proof of immunization or had not received it," said Charlie Maimone, Director of Residence Life, "and of those 29 none have been asked to leave yet."

Maimone was impressed with the students' actions. "They took the immunizations seriously," he said.

UNCW is but one of a number of several universities across the state with reported measles cases and one in which the problem, according to one health official, "has been quickly rectified."

UNCW Under Water In Eighty Years

BY GREG GERRANS
STAFF WRITER

Is it hot enough for you? Take a look around you and notice. The climate is undergoing radical changes which will effect every man, woman and child. These changes are a direct result of two phenomena, Global Warming and apathy.

I recently questioned some of my acquaintances here at UNCW for their views on the greenhouse effect. The responses ranged from "What is it?" to, "I don't care about it." The apparent lack of knowledge as to what is going on in the environment is truly shocking.

The new Secretary of State, James Baker III, called for international unity to overcome the effects of Global Warming. It was his first official action. The government is beginning to recognize that the scope of the problems are so great that it will require individual as well as international work to save mankind.

The nation as a whole is concerned with socio-economic gain rather than trying to protect world. In reality both are very tightly connected and neither can exist without the other.

Here are a few points to consider. This past summer's temperatures soared to record breaking heights. The five hottest summers recorded in history have been recorded during the 1980's. The results were massive crop failure, rivers drying up and lingering fears as to what might come next.

Another dismal aspect is the shifting of the rain belt. "Where the U.S. grows food (midwest) it will become arid, and d and unproductive," says Dr. Hackney. We are looking at major food shortages as a direct result of Global Warming which causes rain patterns to shift.

The predictions given by the experts make the past events look like a pleasant interlude to the hellish events about to occur.

Other problems associated with Global Warming include temperature increase. An increase in temperature in the arctic will cause ice to melt, raising sea levels. The result would poison land and drinking water with salt, not to mention flooding. Another problem is that water expands when heated. The resulting floods would be catastrophic.

Try to envision UNCW under water within eighty years. That is the type of scenario we are blatantly ignoring.

The immense proportions of the problems associated with Global Warming is now everyone's concern. It will affect anything you do in the future. As students the battle falls to us. We will either uplift humanity to a new zenith or we will watch it crumble.

It is all up to whether you get involved or not. By starting at a campus level we can raise awareness and set an example. It is and awesome responsibility yet I can think of none other better suited for the job. Is it hot enough for you?

Lipman, UNCW's New Warm Fuzzy

BY KAREN ROYE
STAFF WRITER

"Basically, my job is to go along and foster warm and fuzzy feelings by making [the alumni] feel good about their university," stated Howard Lipman, one of the newest additions to the staff of UNCW.

Lipman, 25, began working at UNCW almost two months ago. He is the executive director of resource development in the Department of University Advancement.

His responsibilities include fundraising, or solicitation efforts for the alumni, parents of UNCW students, area businesses, and members of the community.

"I help set goals for this area of the university and work hand-in-hand with the Alumni Association concerning the Alumni Annual Fund," said Lipman.

The money in the Annual Fund is used for funding scholarships, faculty research, academic enrichment, and much more.

the most enthusiastic, and gained the most new donors throughout the fund.

On this night, the dinner will be catered and the Grand Prize will be given away. This prize will be a limosine for an evening with a top for dinner "at a very nice restaurant."

Although Lipman has only been at UNCW a very short time, his impact is already being felt.

Almost $10,000 was raised during the first two nights of the telefund.

"In order to raise the amount of money to reach our $50,000 goal, we must properly market UNCW," said Lipman.

Whether at ECU as an Ambassador, or in his present position at UNCW, it is apparent that Lipman has always been a fundraiser at heart.

Upon graduation at ECU with a degree in Political Science, Lipman became a salesman at T.M.C. Corporation in Dallas, Texas.

After a short time, he landed a job at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, as Director of Annual Giving. He enjoyed this job for three years before moving back to his hometown, Wilmington, NC, and becoming the executive director of resource development at UNCW. When asked how it feels to return to Wilmington, Lipman stated, "It's great. Are you kidding? It's January and it's 65 degrees out there. It's fantastic!"

This funding provides for many important projects on campus...

Lipman said, "This funding provides for many important projects on campus."

A portion of Lipman's job is supervising the UNCW Annual Alumni Telefund. The telefund, which began January 18, will continue through February 2.

"Student volunteers will be calling alumni seeking their support for the Alumni Annual Fund. The goal this year is to raise $50,000. Last year $32,000 was raised," said Lipman.

He went on to say, "Although it is only a small part of my job, it is something that I enjoy very much. It is important that students get involved with this telefund because they are the future of this university."

Lipman, who began fundraising as a freshman Ambassador at East Carolina University, will be working closely with the Ambassadors at UNCW.

Rob Lackey, who is Telefund Coordinator for the Ambassadors, and Lipman began the activity by choosing a captain, from Ambassadors, for each night of telefund. These captains were then responsible for drafting a number of students from various student organizations.

Almost 10,000 was raised during the first two nights

About the Ambassadors, Lipman stated that "they are an elite group of student leader who have generously volunteered their time and effort in perpetuating the ideals of the university."

In order to get all of these student involved, Lipman has set up a number of incentives.

All students participating will not only gain experience in telemarketing, but they will also be rewarded food and prizes.

"Each night different restaurants will cater the dinner. Some of them include ARA, Bennigan's, Kentucky Fried Chicken, Subway, and Philly Deli," said Lipman.

Prizes will also be offered nightly. Many different restaurants and merchants in the area have donated gift certificates.

All-Star Night will be held on February 2, and will be "by invitation only" to the callers who raised the most money, who were

3. You won't get pregnant if you...
☐ a. do it standing up
☐ b. douche with soda
☐ c. don't have an orgasm
☐ d. any of the above
☐ e. none of the above

4. Condoms are a weak and risky method of birth control.
☐ True or ☐ False?

5. The chances of a girl getting pregnant unintentionally before she's 20 years old is...
☐ a. about 1 in 10
☐ b. about 1 in 5
☐ c. about 1 in 3

6. How many teens with babies graduate from high school?
☐ a. almost all
☐ b. about half
☐ c. about 1 in 3

7. The number of American teenagers who get pregnant every year is...
☐ a. 15,000
☐ b. 260,000
☐ c. 1 million

8. You need your parents' permission to get safe, effective birth control.

Editorials

In Defense Of Fulfilling Obligation

It has not been often in the past year that the Seahawk has been told that we do not fulfill our obligations, as we conscientiously strive to keep our priorities straight. We are now utilizing our reserved right to rebut any letter we receive by outlining what we feel is misleading in SGA Vice President Robert Smith's letter.

If our not turning in our names for scholarships on time according to Smith's notion of promptitude is our largest transgression for the year, we are doing better than he is.

Part of his obligation as vice president is, as we mentioned in our last editorial for 1988, the appointment of a chairperson for the Media Publications Board. This board's duty is to serve particular functions for the media, at least one of which is to inform us of the proper due date for the submission of those names.

He fails to mention that no one knew for certain nor had informed us of the number of scholarships available to the Fledgling, Atlantis, WLOZ and ourselves until only the week before that last SGA meeting in which the Senate failed to grant us the scholarships.

Another point worth mentioning is that because there was no Media Pub established, we (the media) had to get together and divide the scholarships up on our own. In the past, the Media Pub has performed that function to avoid the media having to appear at odds with each other. (Fortunately for those responsible for the appointment of the Board, all the editors were on good terms this year, or there would have been much more dust kicked up than this.)

The vice president alleges the list we submitted was failed not because the Seahawk's honesty was doubted (although several senators who were there told us this to be true), but because we failed to include a complete job description of each position in the statement. Smith also says we were not granted the scholarships because we were not present at the meeting. He neglects to mention that we never received those prerequisites in a memo or any other formal communication, that the entire affair was basically conducted by word of mouth, and that nothing to the equivalent of the above was ever mentioned.

Although he denies doubt of our honesty in that SGA meeting, he forthrightly accuses us of concealing the truth by not revealing our salaries in that editorial. What exactly is the point of that? Apparently he misread the editorial, as we never said anything to indicate that the editors are not paid or that anyone else is not!

The editorial explicitly states "Each media worked all semester on the assumption that we would have those scholarships to pay those we could not salary -- there is no money earmarked for salaries in the money we are allocated..." In fact, there is not.

Although the four editors, the business management, advertising management, and Production Manager are salaried, the money this comes from is our advertising revenue. It is against "SGA Law" to give salaries from allocated money. There is no money granted us in our yearly budget to pay staff writers, thus the necessity of scholarships and the imperativeness of receiving them in time in order to keep our writers motivated. No college student is noble enough to work for free... obviously not Robert Smith either, as he is earning $250 a month, and there's only one night a week you can find him in his office after sundown.

(P.S. As for the complaint about no regular coverage of SGA; if they did anything even vaguely noteworthy for student body, we would have reported it.)

Miranda Frees Murderer! Why?

In April of 1984 Frederick Miller shot and killed a man during a street robbery in Brooklyn, N.Y. He was implicated by his accomplice and the police arrived at Miller's apartment. Miller's mother did not believe the police's accusations and questioned Miller in front of the detectives.

Miller admitted to the killing and even disclosed the location of the murder weapon. Afterwards Miller was taken into custody and later read his Miranda rights, those wonderful rights we have to stay silent and so on.

He confessed to the killing not once, but twice more and his accomplice identified him as the murderer through a one-way mirror.

There was no doubt that Miller had indeed committed the murder. But prior to his trial Miller claimed that his Miranda rights had been violated by the arresting officers. His motions were denied and Miller pleaded guilty.

In the first months of 1988 an appellate court granted him appeal and the guilty plea was thrown out as well as Miller's conviction. The court also held that any future trial of Miller would be held without one of the police-station confessions, without Miller's statements about the location of the weapon and without the accomplice's identification of Miller.

This case lends credence to the fact that Miranda tends to allow criminals to use the system against itself. It can be reasonably stated that Miranda does little, if anything, to affect a person's guilt or innocence.

At some point in time maybe these so called rights can be argued in a higher court, but until then it looks as if we should admit our guilt before officers read us our rights so that our statements cannot be admissible in court.

I feel sorry for the system that allows a man that admits his own guilt to roam free. The only person's rights that I believe to have been violated in this case are the victim's, any future victims of Miller's, and any future victims of those who, like Miller, have gone free.

I read about this case in February's Reader's Digest under a section called "That's Outrageous". I must say that I agree, it really is ludicrous to believe that murderers are allowed to just slide through the bureaucratic loops in the system. The scariest aspect of this, however, is that most of us still believe the system is there to protect us, not them! It's time for Miranda to go and let the police do the job they're paid to do.

"Hold On" To The Past Or "Move On"

How tightly we hang on to the known, the familiar and the safe. It seems that it is a fearful thing to let go and move out into any new territory--new friends, new places, new ideas or new dimensions of our personal lives.

It is true that change involves risk; but also change offers the only promise of the fulfillment of our hopes and our dreams. In this period of economic and global insecurity, I want to affirm once again the value of letting go and embracing the transition times in our lives. And our life at the University can certainly be one of these times.

The process of growing involves change. As Gail Sheehy points out in Passages:

"We are not unlike a particularly hardy crustacean. The lobster grows by developing and shedding a series of hard, protective shells. Each time it expands from within, the confining shell must be sloughed off. It is left exposed and vulnerable until, in time, a new covering grows to replace the old.

With each passage from one stage of human growth to the next we, too, must shed a protective structure. We are left exposed and vulnerable--but also yeasty and embryonic again, capable of stretching in ways we hadn't known before. These sheddings may take several years or more. Coming out of each passage, though, we enter a longer and more stable period in which we can expect relative tranquility and a sense of equilibrium regained."

Transition times such as leaving home for the university, a broken relationship, the experience of failure, the loss of job or divorce, are times of stress. They are also the growth points in our human life. They maybe times of risk and heightened vulnerability, but they are times, as well, of transition where something known and dear is given up and we refashion our world with new experiences and new people and new options.

Such times of letting go call for us to die a little to the safe, the comfortable and the familiar. They may ask us to give up old freedoms and even more frequently move to surrender old dependencies.

Our choice in so many little decisions is whether to "hold on" to the past or "move on" into a vulnerable embryonic future.

Basic Qualities of Relationships

Relationships are a subject that most people can relate to. Now, wasn't that profound. I have had many relationships and an Interpersonal Communications course here at UNCW. That doesn't make me an expert, but that never stopped me in the past.

Every relationship is unique in its own right, but from what I've experienced, there seems to be some basic qualities to each one which causes them to fall into specific groups. Of course there are your "good" and "bad" relationships. Usually the past ones are bad and the present one is good. (Unless it's on the rocks.) There is a whole lot more to it than good and bad.

Let me give you a run down of the many which I have been involved in or have witnessed.

First, we've got the "I love her like sin, but she hates the slime I walk on" relationships. Of course this is an unenviable position if you're the hater. You've seen it. Some poor dorky slob making a fool of himself and walking around with stars in his eyes. He would eat a bowl of slugs if the hater offered to look in his general direction in the near future. Only time and many facial slaps to the hater puts an end to this sorry state. I haven't been involved in this kind, but I was close on a few occasions.

I was involved in a couple of "I love you like sin, but you love me when it's convenient" relationships. It's not a much more enviable position than the previous one I mentioned. In fact, it could be worse, due to false hope. The roller coaster ride can be a doozy. The poor slob (me) would be sitting on top of the world, acting as cool as he possibly can and Wham! Next thing he knows, he is feeling lower than whale dung. By the way, you women can relate to this by being the hater or hater, you've been there too. I'm just writing it from my male point of view. A view with which I'm quite familiar.

I know that you have seen the sorry situation of the super nice girl with the macho asshole who treats her like bathroom scum. I've seen that too many times and it drives me crazy. These females wind up with the lowest self-esteem in history.

(A bit hyperbolic, but you catch my drift.) Then they feel that they deserve such terrible treatment.

Many cases exist where a couple has been a couple for so long that they don't even know why they are a couple. All they do is fight and cry and talk nasty about each other. I'm referring to boyfriend and girlfriend. They don't have to stay together, and why they do, is beyond me. Are they too lazy to look for someone else, or are they afraid of AIDS? I have seen many couples, and I use the term loosely, in this situation. It amazes me. Why not go back out on the hunt? They may get lucky; where's their sense of adventure?

When a good relationship starts, you know, when both participants are crazy about each other--strange happenings occur. They always have to "be together", they can't take their hands or lips off each other and they have no time for friends or family anymore. You probably recognize the symptoms. It is sickening and pathetic to everyone except the couple involved. They share a love that is unequalled in the history of relationships.

Other symptoms are a need to walk with their hips joined, like Siamese twins, everybody else becomes "so superficial" and other activities which used to excite them, like going out drinking with friends or being involved with sports, becomes silly and immature. All of these symptoms are called intensifying. It lasts from one to eight months normally. The problem is that they don't snap out of it at the same time.

Some morning, one is liable to wake up and think, "boy, I hate the way she spends so much time in the bathroom, what does she do in there?" Or, one may think, "I hate the way he's always adjusting the croch he's pants. Why does he do that?" This -- is called differentiation. This is when one realizes that the other one may occasionally defecate, and it may stink. It's tough on the participant who hasn't reached that level yet. They are left bewildered and thinking, "it's over; the honeymoon is over." They don't usually realize that it is a natural progression of a relationship and can be devastated. They tend to have a sudden urge to call their friends and see what's happening. (They'll take quite a ribbing too.)

As the saying goes, "I've kissed many toads in my time, but I finally found a princess." All the humiliation, all the sacrifice, all the "being a weenie", and all of the self-doubt was worth it. I think it's much better to have experienced all the mega-highs and megas-lows than to have just sat home and spanked my monkey. Living is learning. If you survive differentiation in a relationship--it's got possibilities.

The Beginning Of A New Error?

BY WENDELL JONES
VICE-PRESIDENT
COLLEGE DEMOCRATS

Over the holidays I came across a bumper sticker reading, "January 20, 1989...The beginning of a new error." Obviously it remains to be seen what kind of President George Bush will be not to mention how effective and rational. What is clear from the sticker and the history soon to be written on the Reagan years is that they have indeed been a "Reign of Error."

It would be unfair however, to judge the past administration purely in terms of my standards and the ideology of the liberal sector in America. We should in fact judge the administration in its own terms, by the standards Reagan set for it in 1980.

When Reagan campaigned against President Carter, something he is still doing, he campaigned for a smaller government promising to eliminate the Departments of Education and Energy.

Not only are they still there, he added the Department of Veteran Affairs. In fact, the government is bigger than ever before.

He campaigned for "supply side economics" claiming it would revitalize our economy and all would prosper due to the "trickle down theory." One could argue either side of the value of supply side economics but what is evident is the economy has come around but very few in America have benefited.

In 1979 a young couple buying their first house could expect to have to pay the equivalent of one-third their annual gross income as a downpayment. In 1988 the same couple will have to put up one half.

In addition, since 1980 the Lorenz curve which is used to measure equality of income distribution in the nation has moved away from equality meaning simply...the rich got richer and the poor got poorer.

Reagan campaigned in 1980 to get government, "off our backs." He deregulated the airlines, and air safety has declined. He deregulated safety in the work place, and compensation awards have risen.

But at the same time he blackmailed states to both raise the legal age for the purchase and consumption of alcohol, and require persons in automobiles to wear seatbelts.

While creating the budget deficit he campaigned for a strong America. No one argues that our economy is not facing a potential crisis. If said crisis occurs, the ramifications will damage our world standing.

Former Secretaries of State Dr. Henry Kissinger and Cyrus Vance, wrote in Foreign Affairs this past summer, "U.S. political leadership in the world cannot be sustained if confidence in the American economy continues to be undermined by substantial trade and budget deficits."

By Reagan's own standards, his administration failed. It was in fact the most corrupt administration in history with over 125 officials implicated or indicted. History will not be kind.

Finally, there is foreign affairs. In the last eight years South Africa has been poorly handled, Central America has been a national embarrassment, Europe is beginning to lose faith in us, and our one success may turn into a nightmare. The Soviets have no need to defeat us on a battle field, they are killing us diplomatically.

Where Reagan has pursued the neanderthal policy of "Peace through strength," the Soviets have hit on what appears to be an extremely effective policy of "Strength through peace." They have never been closer to Japan and Europe and with the soon to be European Economic Community around the corner, we may never be that close again.

Smoking, Homecoming, Etc...

To the Editor:

Several issues have come up recently on campus that I feel compelled to address.

First, I am a smoker. When the faculty senate passed the resolution on smoking I agreed with it. A non-smoker should not have to endure smoke while they wait for class or in any other situation. I do not agree with the petition distributed by LivWell which called for the removal of cigarette vending machines. That is ludicrous; it will not prevent any smoker from smoking; it takes money away from scholarships (vending machine profits contribute to scholarship funds) and it inhibits the constitutional right to the pursuit of happiness.

I would also like to know where the administration thinks they are going to find room in the buildings for a smoking room. If such space is available I'm sure several departments would be fighting to use it.

I do hope they find the space, because if they don't, every porch on campus will smell and look like an ashtray.

The second issue concerns the selection of the Homecoming Court. The traditional process is criticized as being a popularity contest...what the hell is wrong with that? These persons are supposed to represent the students, who could select them better than the students? If you are going to use a panel to select the court, shouldn't it be made up of students and alumni? Isn't that what Homecoming's all about, the alumni coming back and everyone getting together to celebrate? Faculty/Staff should have nothing to say about who should be in the court. They say the selection will be based on merit and personality, what do you do to merit being on the court, dress real well or pretty? Can't students do anything for themselves?

My final beef with this week is the editorial of the last paper in the Fall semester. The author hopes SGA will fulfill its obligations in the future. That's like the pot calling the kettle black, the media also has obligations.

"Every porch on campus will look like an ashtray"

The Seahawk should tell the whole truth. The two editors of the Seahawk are paid $280.00 a month and at least three others are being paid $175.00 a month, not to mention several others who work for salary, wages and commissions.

Another obligation of the media was to compile a list of people who should receive the scholarships, they didn't do that until the week before the last senate meeting of the semester. When the proposal came before the senate the media again didn't do their part because none of them were there.

The author also says the senate questioned the Seahawk's honesty, that isn't true, we couldn't make a decision without any information other than a persons name. With the exception of the Atlantis, we had no idea what those persons even did for the media. Lastly, even did for the media. Almost completely motivated by self-interest, this is demonstrated by the fact that the SGA was last mentioned in the paper on October 27th. The Seahawk should be consistent on it's coverage, not just covering student government when their own interest is involved!

Immunization was less than perfect

To the Editor:

This letter is in regards to the recent immunization process that was held on campus. As student body president, I am concerned that perhaps a more accurate method could have been used. This stems from the many students that were dismissed from classes on Tuesday, January 31st.

It has been brought to my attention that some students did not receive any notice about their status of needing a vaccination shot. I am sure that they are being honest because I happen to be one of the victims of this matter.

I realize that the Student Health and Wellness Center was posed with a problem that needed immediate response. I also understand that with any such urgencies mistakes can be made. My only problem is the way these students were treated for something that they had no control over.

These students became first aware that they needed the vaccine, when their names were called off in class. This led to the belief that the students had been negligent in taking care of their responsibilities. Often students found themselves humiliated when chastised by their peers. Some students missed exams and were told that their absence would be unexcused. I is most inappropriate for them to be punished because of the problems that arose in the Student Health and Wellness Center.

When I approached Dr. Jewell, Director of the Student Health and Wellness Center, she admitted that I had not been mailed a letter, her only recourse was to state that maybe some of the workers were not as "alert" as they should have been. Well because of this, I personally have missed four important classes.

I truly empathize with Dr. Jewell. I know that she is working hard to bring this issue to an end. I just hope that those students who were affected will be allowed to make up exams and that their absence will not be counted a s unexcused. I would also hope that the Student Health and Wellness Center will offer apologies to those students that were affected.

Sincerely,
Karla F. Alston
Student Body President

Basketball Players Gain Support Of The Faculty

Dear Editor:

Recently, Kenny Mickens and Ricky Griffin were dismissed from the UNC-W basketball team. Clearly, these young men made a serious error in judgment and we are not condoning their behavior.

Unfortunately, the publicity surrounding this behavior gives one the impression that Kenny and Ricky have no redeeming qualities. On the contrary, they have made contributions to UNC-Wilmington and the community at large. More specifically, they have faithfully served on the UNCW basketball team for a combined total of seven years.

Additionally, Kenny is a member of a fraternity which has sponsored blood drives, sickle cell testing, and other worthwhile activities. The faculty and staff whose names are listed below would like to go on record as being friends and supporters of Kenny and Ricky.

We know them well and will never regard them as troublemakers, disruptive influences or distractions. Rather, they are dignified and intelligent men who made a mistake. We are confident that the potential that these young men have constantly shown will take them far in life and we wish them well.

Errante Alleges Seahawk Negligence

Editor:

You are supposedly the voice of the students, by the students, and for the students. And yet twice in the past 3 months, articles delivered to you from the LivWell/Alternatives! Center have been completely excluded from this paper.

In both instances, these articles had precious timing as they were crucial parts of campus-wide media campaigns observing Alcohol Awareness Week and, now, most recently, Drug Awareness Week.

We eagerly anticipated the printing of the article in last week's edition that would have advertised "Drug Scenes," a skit competition open to all students, faculty and staff involving drug-related themes with prizes of $100.00, $75.00 and $50.00.

Unfortunately, the submission deadline for this event was February 2. Now it is very likely that this particular event will have to be cancelled during Drug Awareness Week (February 6-10) due to lack of entries-entries that might have been made had students known about the opportunity.

As a fairly new program on campus we need all the support we can get in advertising our programs. We do what we can through campus mail and through classes, but the truth is that the Seahawk probably has the highest visibility and is our vital link to students.

Had last week's edition been full of priority articles and urgent news, I could have possibly managed some understanding; however, I couldn't help but notice the 22 sprawling advertisements for those eminent (not "imminent") services such as Tanning Salons and Daytona Beach Parties.

Sincerely,
Sandy Errante, Coordinator Alternatives!

EDITOR'S NOTE:

We acknowledge that the article of which Ms. Errante writes was indeed left out of the 1/26/89 issue of the Seahawk, but it was not preempted by our advertisements, it was merely an honest mistake.

We regret that Ms. Errante does not see this, and would like to remind anyone else who feels this way that without advertising, UNCW would not have a newspaper to utilize when advertising programs.

NOAA Granted Big Bucks

The NOAA Undersea Research Center at UNCW has received $593,013 in additional funding for the UNCW program. NURC/UNCW was founded in 1980 to promote, facilitate and conduct research in the Southeastern United States utilizing undersea techniques, including advanced wet diving and manned and unmanned submersibles. Dr. Alan Hulbert, program director, will administer the grant which will be used to support center administration, scientific and operations staff, the center administrative functions and to purchase needed supplies, services and equipment for the program.

Lewis' Article Published

D. Charles Lewis, chairman of the health, physical education and recreation department, has had his article, "Equipment Safety Check in Camp Settings," published in the Winter 1988 issue of Leisure Litigation Digest, vol. 2 No. 4.

Waxman Publishes Feminism Article

Barbara Frey Waxman, associate professor of English, has had her article, "Politics of the Survey Course: Feminist Challenges," published in the February 1989 issue of Teaching English in the Two-Year College. The journal is a publication of the National Council of Teachers of English.

Blanks Keynote Speaker

Dr. Deliah Blanks of the department of sociology and anthropology was the keynote speaker for the Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Holiday Celebration at Brunswick Community College. She spoke on "Living and Realizing Dr. King's Dream Through Educational, Economic and Political Endeavors." Dr. Blanks also received the "Outstanding Achievements in Community Services Award" from the black Employees of Federal Paper Board during their annual Dr. King celebration services on January 16.

N.I.C. Considers Radical Plan To End Pledging

(CPS) — National fraternity leaders, hoping to end a rash of hazing deaths and injuries and to stave off simply being banned from many campuses, say they are seriously considering a radical reform: ending pledging.

The national presidents of 59 fraternities voted to ask their organizations to study alternatives to pledging during the annual meeting of the National Interfraternity Conference (NIC), held in December in Burlingame, Calif.

One alternative, they said, is to ask students to become full members immediately after a brief time, skipping the traditional pledge period.

"Despite our best efforts, the hazing and the death continue," said Drury G. Barwell, president of Phi Sigma Kappa fraternity and assistant vice president for student affairs at the University of Maryland. "Nothing seems to eliminate hazing and death from the structure of pledging."

"Our survival is at stake," he continued. "If we can't eliminate pledging, colleges and universities will eliminate it for us."

"The public," maintained Dwayne R. Woerpel, a national officer of Tau Kappa Epsilon, "is fed up with us and universities are fed up with us."

While the national frat presidents — all of whom are no longer students — called for reform, active fraternity members disagreed.

"Some chapters have problems with the traditional role of pledge, but it's no problem if it's used the right way," suggested Randall Stevens, president of the University of Kentucky's Phi Kappa Chi chapter.

"Pledging at PKP is a learning process," he explained. "Pledges learn about their brothers and about participating in the group. Everything is positive."

"membership should be earned, not given away," added Delta Tau Delta's Todd Mantz, a senior at Kansas State. The pledge period "lets brothers see if the pledge contributes to his house and evaluate what kind of person he is."

Hazing should be abolished, he added, but otherwise the present system is "okay."

Some national leaders, too, felt that dropping the pledging process would be drastic.

"I don't support the notion that pledging and hazing are synonymous," said James C. Cherry, a Sigma Nu official. "I don't agree that all efforts to eliminate hazing have failed. Many of our chapters have found success with a judicious application of education and enforcement."

The NIC, representing more than 400,000 students on 809 campuses nationwide and in Canada, cannot pass binding resolutions. But it does carry great weight because it reflects the consensus of the fraternities. Executive Director Jonathan Brant said,

Students invited to join a fraternity are known as "pledges" during a period in which they're supposed to prove their fitness to belong to the chapter. Many fraternity chapters subject their pledges to arcane rituals — much of it harmless, but some of it degrading, dangerous and in some cases deadly — before initiating them as full members.

For example, Scott Phillips, a University of Texas Delta Tau Delta pledge, was killed in September after he fell hazing incident.

Another University of Texas pledge, Mark Seeburger, died in his sleep in 1986 after Phi Kappa Psi brothers forced him to down more than half a bottle of rum during a initiation rite.

And in February, 1988, James C. Callahan, a Rutgers University freshman, died after consuming what one law enforcement official called "a tremendous amount of alcohol" during a "drink 'til you're sick" pledging ceremony at the school's Lambda Chi Alpha chapter.

Other pledging incidents have included sexual assaults, destructive parties and racial insults. Last year, in just one of several similar episodes, two black women brought charges against the University of California at Santa Barbara Delta Tau Delta chapter when a pledge shouted racial and sexual affronts at them.

Six University of Tennessee Kappa Alpha Psi brothers were charged with assault in June after beating a pledge with a paddle during an induction ceremony.

In response, courts, schools, other students and parents have taken turns starting public demonstrations of revulsion at the carnage.

Legally, a court recently awarded Jeffrey V. Furek $30,000 in damages for burns he received when his prospective University of Delaware Sigma Phi Epsilon brothers poured oven cleaner over his head during a 1980 "Hell Night."

Dozens of states, including Texas, Missouri and Pennsylvania, have enacted anti-hazing laws in recent years.

Schools themselves have cracked down hard. Cal-Santa Barbara, for one, banished Delta Tau Delta while Tennessee placed Kappa Alpha Psi on indefinite probation.

Several, including Colby, Amherst, Gettysburg, Middlebury and Castleton State colleges have banned all fraternities and sororities from their campuses in recent years. In July, the University of Lowell in Massachusetts, scandalized when a pledge almost died after being forced to spend the night in a sleeping bag in an attic in 107-degree heat, abolished its greek system.

Such incidents, which unfolded after years of efforts to stop hazing, left many of the NIC delegates in Burlingame convinced that only radical reform could stop more schools from dismantling their greek systems.

"Pledging has become synonymous with hazing," Tau Kappa Epsilon's Woerpel argued. "Our environment is moving against us. If we don't move soon, we will die like the dinosaurs who could not adapt. This is no time to wait and see what happens."

The NIC's Brant maintained greeks can live without pledging.

"It was only at the turn of the century that pledging was established. Fraternities existed many years without pledging, and we can do it again."

Some are trying. Zeta Beta Tau already has ordered its chapters to eliminate pledging. Greeks at Tulane University are considering abolishing the pledge process.

The University of Colorado Delta Upsilon chapter announced its pledges will participate in an Outward Bound program instead of this month's "Hell Week," a time traditionally set aside for hazing.

Greek Leaders say abolishing pledging may put an end to abusive drinking practices

We The Mediocre

By Kelly Holsten

Bicycle Face Reviewed

"WE, THE MEDIOCRE" was originally a column dealing with alternative music record reviews, club dates, and other assorted GIMCRACKERY. Somewhere along the line it mutated into this strange mixture of satire, IRE, and impending DOOM. While this does seem like a perfectly sensible mutation, I think there is a time when one must go back to the Root of Ugliness to get a hand hold on the BASE, the CORE, the point of disgusting ORIGIN.....Also I can't think of anything else to WRITE about.

Last Monday night, two bands from Greensboro played in ORTON'S pool hall to a demented mixture of Frat House types, social outcasts, moral rejects, hip wannabes, and a handful of Individuals.

The opening band, WAREHOUSE, was your typical punk band clone; they were solid and adequate, but broke no new ground. The second band, BICYCLE FACE, was an assault on everything TRIED and TRUE in the rapidly decaying Alternative music scene.

These three misfits managed to breathe some new life into the stale bread music scene currently festering in Wilmington's self-proclaimed SOHO district.

This band was not your normal line-up. The guitar player discarded the mandatory solid-body electric for an Ovation acoustic guitar wired through a distortion box into 200 watts of electronics and speakers.

The bass player acquired an Ibanez bass that had been cut down to the size of a loaf of bread. The drummer sat on a wooden stool behind one floor tom, a snare drum, and two cymbals—a Zildjian, and a hubcap off a '68 Galaxy 500.

During half the first set, the crowd stood stunned and slack-jawed, not quite sure of what to make of the proceedings. No one danced. No one moved. The music consisted of a haphazard mixture of originals and an assortment of offbeat covers that could only be assembled by true pure-bred lunatics.

How do you react to a set consisting of mutilated versions of a Peter Frampton song, Freebird, and the theme from THE BRADY BUNCH? And what if this was quickly followed by a version of SPINAL TAP'S infamous "BIG BOTTOM" done on acoustic guitar, bass, and TUBA?

Yes, there was mass confusion in the minds of many spectators. As for the sound....well, comparisons seem to do this band injustice. Let's just say their sound resembled something like an adenoidal friend, electrocuted Camper Van Beethoven mated with the Violent Femmes after an overdose of Vitamin B-12.

These guys played with complete abandon, a quality which appears to be lacking in most of the bands currently hovering about the city limits. Although BICYCLE FACE failed to sever the sorry umbilical cord linking FAD ART with MUSIC, they did manage to inject some much needed FUN quotient back into the self-posturing music clones residing in Alternative Land.

Program Formed To Link Parents With UNCW

BY KAREN FOYE
STAFF WRITER

When a college student has a problem, scholastic or otherwise, he has his peers, parents, or advisor to seek advice from. When a faculty member has a concern, they have their colleagues. Until now, there has been no organization for parents to vent their needs, fears, and concerns about their child's university. Thus, a parents program has been formed.

"School is expensive and, in most cases, the parents are paying for it. The university wants to know what the parents expect," says Jean Joyner, coordinator for parents and ambassador programs at UNCW. Joyner adds that "nearly every college, either already has a parents program or is in the developmental process for one." The program began as a vision in the mind of Douglas Moore, vice chancellor for university advancement. He was unavailable for comment.

Moore, Joyner, and others have established a set of objectives for the parents program. A few of these are: - To serve as an official communications link between parents, faculty, and the administration of UNCW. - To express parents concerns to the chancellor and administration, and - To be a "sounding board" for the chancellor and administration concerning ideas and issues affecting students and/or parents.

In order to accomplish these objectives more thoroughly, a parents council advisory board has been formed. Joyner says that she is "training the advisory board to be ambassadors to other parents."

The advisory council is headed-up by Jean Joyner and consist of twenty-five other parents from across North Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia.

The co-chairs for this council, Ned and Sibyl Lavengood, are from Wilson, NC and are the parents of Traci Lavengood, a sophomore at UNCW. They work closely with Joyner in helping to organize and expand the program.

Sibyl Lavengood says that it is a "wonderfully, exciting program designed to keep communication open between the parents and the university...the staff has been extremely cooperative and all of the parents seem to be quite enthusiastic and ready to expand (the program)."

At the present time there are over 350 parents who have expressed interest in becoming involved. These are the persons who attended Parents Day '88, which was held on September 24. The day consisted of lectures given by eight UNCW professors, a brunch, a campus tour, and an information session concerning tuition, career planning, money management for the student, and personal development. Although all sources agree that the day was a tremendous success, only a small percentage of UNCW parents were present.

These numbers, however, are expected to rise significantly with the parents of 5,000 students being contracted. They will receive a "Proud Parent" decal, a news release, a survey, and a letter from Joyner.

"We want to provide information to, and get feedback from every parent," says Joyner. "We plan to promote good, positive images of the university to both parents and students. It is something that I enjoy because I am both a parent and a student."

Besides her responsibilities with the parents program, Joyner is also advisor to the ambassador program, a part-time student majoring in Psychology, and a mother of two. Both of her children have graduated from North Carolina colleges.

"I believe in and care about this (parents) program because I am a parent and a student both...I am a student, parent, and professional woman who is enthusiastic and caring about what I do. My job is hectic, but very enjoyable because UNCW people are interesting people who are interested in the university," says Joyner.

Because of her tremendous appreciation for, and dedication to UNCW, Jean Joyner has made great headway with the parents program. Some of the many activities planned in the future include: - February 18-19 Parents Weekend - April 2-6 Parents Telefund - Spring '89 - Receptions hosted by the Advisory Board for the families of incoming freshmen.

UNCW COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT RETREAT

WISH YOU HAD BEEN THERE!

The retreat was fun! I feel like I returned to campus with over 50 new friends.
Cathy Birmingham

When you are the average person, it is so important to be able to communicate with people who are not like you.
John M. Berry

Definitely worth the time spent! I did an excellent job with breaking down the barriers between students, faculty, and student organizations. I only wish there were more people here to hear what was said.
Basil Kipavich

One of a Kind!!! This retreat is beyond anything that words can describe. It is a feeling that even though this world is full of differences, we can all share in the many advantages that life (and UNCW) has to offer.
Jim A. Hughes

Everyone is on the same level (scholarship, faculty) very much with campus while "Native!!"
I have never gotten this close to a group of people in such a short time. It was great.
Christine E. Ingfisher

THE RETREAT SPENT IN DIFFERENT ROOMS CHAIRS IN TOWN...
A great way to meet fascinating people who are different from yourself.
- Vince Thayer

A surprisingly unique opportunity to let down "barriers" and learn about people.
Jacqueline Sherman

THE Leadership CENTER

By attending this retreat I've learned to relate with those that are culturally different from what I am. All in all, barriers can be broken.
Jenny Cook

Although I was sick, I was still able to enjoy the retreat. Meeting all of the different people and taking myself through my life as a different person gives me the things I enjoyed most. I am looking forward to the next one and the reunion in Feb.
Lisa Butler

A great way to explore and challenge our unique individuality and to appreciate one another.
John M. Berry

I do not propose to quote and look back on all the great experiences I've had here at UNCW. This retreat will be one of my fondest memories. Thank you to all those responsible, and thank you to all of the people who have made UNCW so very special to me.
Kevin T. Chin

The opportunities for personal growth and development were enormous!
John M. Berry

Personally, I derived an all-around sense of positive input on all-around many of the games and exercises were necessary in establishing trust and group dynamics, as well as helping us define our problems and goals.

ECU's Edwards: A "Blue Chipper" in Every Sense

The last time I personally saw a game so thoroughly dominated by a single presence was back in Harrisonburg, Va. during the late 70's when a tall lanky fellow the natives called Ralph strode awkwardly up and down the hardwood averaging an impressive 30+ points per game.

At times he made the game look too easy, the manner in which he dominated every aspect of each game in leading his team to a second straight state championship.

Last Saturday night in Trask Coliseum, I saw a young man well on his way to a prosperous professional career turn out a performance that was nothing short of spectacular.

Theodore "Blue" Edwards was the name he scribbled in my pre-game program before hastily boarding the bus for a solemn ride back to Greenville.

Earlier that night, he scored a coliseum record 36 points, and could have gotten more had he not been removed. To put it bluntly, he was the ECU offense. Still, it was not enough, as UNCW thoroughly whipped ECU 81-66.

He scored 23 points in the first half alone prompting UNCW head coach to revamp his defensive scheme at halftime and double team the 6-5, 205 lb. senior in an attempt to slow him down.

"I had never been involved in a game where a player had a chance to score 50 points," McPherson said. "But tonight, Blue had a shot. He was simply amazing."

*****

And how he did it was probably more impressive than what he did.

Often soaring above taller players to snatch a rebound, then stepping out behind the three-point arc to drill a three pointer, finishing the break with a thunderous slam, or perhaps the best memory, leaping high to grab a defensive rebound and palming the ball, letting everyone know that he was indeed in control.

But tremendous athletes are as common as flat-top haircuts. They are everywhere. Only the ones with character make it and what really stands out more than anything else about this guy was his attitude.

In an age when hotshot athletes are often tempted by the pitfalls of sports corruption, Blue Edwards is the exception.

Not that he hasn't made his share of mistakes, because he has.

Last year if you can recall, Blue Edwards did not dominate any games. He sat out as a penalty for a stupid mistake, a mistake that could have possibly threatened his future career.

Even his misconduct showed signs of genuine concern. He merely helped out a friend who was in a bind. There was more to it, of course, but you won't read it here.

Instead of sulking he payed his dues, worked hard and now is profiting. A blessing in disguise, some may say.

Whatever, he seems sincere in his words. A communications major, his soft-spoken voice is as much out of place hidden inside that menacing face as Mike Tyson's is. There were no "man's" and "you knows" and the use of double negatives were totally obsolete as well.

His coach says that it is a pure delight to be involved with a player such as Edwards. "He's more than just a great basketball player," said coach Mike Steele. "He's a great person."

Edwards says that his teammates should not feel intimidated playing with him. I find that a little hard to believe.

Whenever there is a situation in which one player is vastly greater than his teammates, there is a tendency to stand around and watch. And judging by the number of points the rest of his team scored in comparison to the numbers he put on the board, it seems quite obvious that they were doing exactly that.

It seems just as obvious that there were quite a few more onlookers who marveled at his performance here last Saturday night, too. About 6,000 more, including a few NBA scouts.

Blue Edwards told me afterwards that he hopes to someday make it in the NBA, and he was by watching him one time, I see no reason to doubt why that will not someday occur.

THE ULTIMATE WORKOUT

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

It possesses the running tactics of soccer, the pivoting motions of basketball, and the strength and endurance of football. Surprisingly, it's non-contact and better for your health than jogging. What's more, it's sweeping university campuses by storm. Yes, the fast paced, quick-scoring sport of Ultimate Frisbee has planted its roots in Wilmington.

The sport was invented at a Columbia High School in Maplewood, New Jersey in 1968. Less than a year later it was seen on the fields of prestigious Ivy League colleges of Harvard and Princeton. Since then it has spread nationwide. It landed here at UNCW in 1979, brought by a student named Steve Spear who headed the fledgling program until his graduation in 1981.

However, the sport didn't dissolve with his departure, but gained a new leader in Toad Ledger. He is the present leader and team captain of the Seamen, the UNCW Ultimate Frisbee Club. There is also a women's team, the Seaweed, that formed in 1985.

You have probably played the sport unknowingly in your high school gym class under its lay term of frisbee football, but for those of you that were deprived of this pleasure here are the mechanics of the sport. The field is 70 yards long and 40 yards wide. It contains 25 yards deep endzones designated by orange cones. The sport has a honor code between opposing players because there exist no referees to rule over deceptives in play.

49ers Go Out With The Tide

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

The line "The tide is high but I'm moving on" in a 70 hit by Blondie, seemed to fit the outstanding swimming exhibition put on by the Hawks last Saturday in Trask Natatorium.

The tide of losses had been building up continuously all semester as the Seahawks had gone winless in '89. But, backed by a strong team meeting and a rejuvenated spirit the Hawks crushed the UNC-Charlotte 49ers by a combined score 368-295.

The men's team, led by senior team captain Phillippe Roth, trounced their foe 151-80. They dominated from start to finished taking a commanding 20 point lead after only six events.

Every event furthered the Seahawks lead to the point of a definie win before the final four events were to be swum.

However it was clearly evident that Coach Dave Allen wanted this meet bad! He continued to push his swimmers with all the body language allowed by law. He shouted words of encouragement until he was hoarse and personally congratulated every swimmer when they emerged from the pool.

"I was trying to do anything I could do to fire this team up. They need a leader to turn to and I was assuming either a handler, middlefield, or deep positioning. The object of the game is rather simple. The handler tries to fling the frisbee anyway he can to a midfielder who is nearby or to the deep man who is roaming around the endzone line. He can throw it to his teammates in basically three different fashions: a forehand, backhand, or overhead style.

A forehand style is performed by placing two fingers spread slightly apart underneath the frisbee and released with a flip of a wrist. This throw is used generally in play and for long distance throwing. The backhand throw is the one most people are a custom to when releasing the frisbee. It's done by moving the frisbee inward toward your body and releasing it away from yourself with a flick of your wrist outward. The overhead or hammer throw is performed by throwing the frisbee vertically like a baseball to your partner.

As the stationary handler tries to complete the passes to his teammates down field, he is shadowed by a defender who trying to impede his progress by using his arms and legs to block the passing lanes. The defender calls out a ten count in hopes of forcing a incomplete or bad pass. Both result in a turnover of the frisbee to the other team. The players often alternate positioning and each goal scored is worth 1 point. The winner of the game is the first team to 15 points.

"It's a fun and demanding sport to play," exclaimed sophomore Dorian Jamison. "All you need is the fever," stated Toad Ledger. The Seamen consists of 25 members this semester but are always looking for new members. The team practices daily

Hawks Whip ECU Edwards Scores Record 36 Points

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

Former UNCW assistant coach Ron Meikle was back in town Saturday night to watch the Hawks duel arch-rival ECU, but not just to exchange a few handshakes with old friends.

His new job, as an NBA scout with the Cleveland Cavaliers, forces him to venture into various gyms evaluating prospective talents for the up-coming draft. Specifically he was here to see ECU's marvelous Blue Edwards, in addition to the Seahawks Larry Houzer and Antonio Howard.

He later said Edwards is indeed a "Blue Chipper", as did the rest of the Seahawks after the senior sensation lit up Trask Coliseum for a gym-record 36 points, on a staggering 10-15 performance from the floor, but it went for naught as UNCW outscored the Pirates 41-28 over the final twenty minutes to take a 81-66 victory before a raucous crowd of over six thousand.

"He's probably one of the finest players we'll see," said Robert McPherson. "He is an outstanding talent. He does everything real well."

ECU opened the game by racing out to a quick 10-2 lead, sparked by Edwards three-pointer from just right of the key with less than four minutes gone.

UNCW, led by Houzer's team-high 19 points, eventually gained its first lead after a 16-7 run that included a Howard breakaway dunk and a three-pointer from Brannon Lancaster.

Edwards then took over, scoring 11 straight Pirate points as the reclaimed the lead 25-20 with 8:01 remaining in the opening period.

UNCW then chipped away at the lead, and outscored ECU 20-13 to take a 40-38 halftime advantage.

Edwards scored 23 of the Pirates 38 points.

"I told th kids at halftime," said winning coach Robert McPherson, "that I had never been from 4:00-6:00 and is something with other club teams across the country. Last Saturday the Seamen blew by their East Carolina counterpart 15-9. They are tuning up their play in hopes of qualifying for the Ultimate Players Association Championships that are schedule for the UNCW campus in March.

In order to reach the championship the team must first win its sectional tournament that consists of teams from the neighbor states of North Carolina, Virginia, D.C., and Maryland. If they are successful in that endeavor then they must win the regionals to advance to the finals. The regional includes top teams out of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware. The Seamen finished ninth last year but has high aspirations for this year tourney.

The women's team has reemerged from extinction this semester. They aren't as smooth or aggressive with the frisbee as the men but are fun to watch. "Ultimate is challenging, different, and most important non-contact. The hardest part is handling the frisbee and locating the open man," said Kim Lowery. Currently the Seaweed has fared well in play with its 18 members. "No one thought we would win a game in the Pittsburg Tourney but we did," she said. The Seaweed also tasted victory Saturday by defeating ECU 15-6.

Both teams will try to make it to the final frisbee competition that is being held at UNCW. All interested players are welcome to try out. So if you're tired of joggng off those Domino's pizzas specials, come on out and try the new sport on the rise.

It's the ultimate thing to do.

involved in a game where a guy scored 50 points, but unless we do something positive, he will."

The "something positive" was for Lancaster to double (team) down on Edwards and force the other ECU players to carry the scoring load.

"He (Edwards) just killed us in the first half," admitted Lancaster. "Coach told us to not worry so much about the guards and to help out down low. We came out much more aggressive in the second half."

Coach Mike Steele put the game in a very simple perspective.

"We had two guards who played thirty minutes or more and didn't score," he said. "It's that simple. We knew they were going to change up defenses on Blue, everybody does, but if our guards are not more proficient, then we won't beat anybody."

Inhibited somewhat by the defensive attention, Edwards scored only 13 points in the second half his last two coming at the free throw line after the game was decided, with 2:48 remaining and the Hawks leading 75-56.

"We came out in the first half and did a good job of going to the glass," Edwards said afterwards. "We stopped doing that in the second half. It's unfortunate to play this well and not have the team win. I stopped looking for my shot in the second half and that hurt us. That was my fault."

ECU scored the final six points of the contest against UNCW's second team to reduce the deficit to 81-66.

Lancaster improved upon a career high two nights before as he netted a new high of 14. Greg Bender added 13, including a key dunk which tied the game at 34 apiece late in the first half and Howard scored 11 points. Robbie Carter converted seven offensive rebounds into a total of 10 points for the Seahawks who re-renewed their record at 9-9.

UNCW's returns to the hardwood Saturday, February 4 to face William and Mary at home in Trask. Game time is scheduled for 7:30.

Mary Tarter was the lone triple winner for the ladies recording victories in the 400 Medley Relay, 200 IM, and 100 breaststroke.

Senior captain Marti Mucci and Freshman standout Laurie Grant posted double victories for the Hawks.

On the diving scene Mary Beth Mills continued her domination on the boards with two more wins and a new 1 meter record for her. She clipped the old mark of 240.20 with a new diving total of 243.02. Elisabeth Crabbe and Jessie Pustis finished second and third on both boards.

In order for them to attain the amount of points necessary to overcome the 49ers lead the Seahawks were forced to post the top three diving positions. The 49ers didn't enter a diver in the 3 meter so all the Hawks had to do was stay within 16 points of the 49ers in order to win and they did.

The Hawks celebrated this victory by tossing both fully clothed Coach Dave Allen and Diving Coach Marc Ellington in the pool. This, the Seahawks first victory in '89, brings the men's mark overall mark 5-6 and the women's to 3-8. Be sure to catch the Hawks in action at the CAA Championships during February 9-11 at Trask Natatorium. The tide was high but the Seahawks are moving on.

going to be it," exclaimed a pleased Allen.

The team took a cue from their now fiery coach and translated it to fast times in the water. The men recorded 10 wins in 15 events and placed second in the other three.

"We all are swimming our best times!" stated Phillippe Roth, senior swim captain.

Roth, in his final home meet, was a triple winner posting victories in the 1000 Free, 500 Free, and 400 Free Relay. Roth set a new pool record in the 1000 Free with a 9:54.97 time, lowering the old mark by 5 seconds.

Brad Kinkema set two new pool marks by obliterating the previous times in the 50 free with a 22:07 and teaming up with teammates Tom Burket, Nick Revelas, and Tim White to shatter the 400 Medley Relay with a 3:35.78.

Kinkema also won the 100 Free while both Revelas and White had two wins.

Diver Jeff Carles won the one and three meter board with Dan Kiser placing second both times. The men performed remarkably in the water equaling or beating personal marks all over the place.

The women had a dog fight on their hands from start to finish. Trailing most of the way to their opponent the Lady Hawksters overcame every obstacle thrown at them to emerge with a come-from-behind victory on the last diving sequence.

Tech Grounds Hawks, 83-80

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

When two freshman reach double figures, a sophomore nets a career high, your two leading scorers both perform to standard, and the game is played on your home court, winning is almost an afterthought, as in guaranteed.

It was and it wasn't Thursday night as UNCW battled Tennessee Tech (a team which they had previously beaten on the road) in a non-conference game at Trask Coliseum.

The game was an afterthought. Both players and coaches agreed that not looking forward to Saturday night's encounter with ECU was impossible.

"Everybody in town was talking about ECU," coach Robert McPherson said afterwards. "We were at the cager luncheon with the coach from Tennessee Tech there and all the questions were about the ECU game."

And with less than ten minutes remaining in the first half with the Hawks leading 33-15, a victory seemed guaranteed, too.

However, despite Joe Cherry's 10 points, Brian Withers' 11, Brannon Lancaster's career-high 10, senior Antonio Howard's 19, and senior Larry Houzer's team-high 21, the Hawks managed to play poorly enough to allow Tech to narrow the gap to a single point, outscoring UNCW 25-7 over the final eight minutes of the opening period.

"Too easy too early," McPherson said. "We came out, got the big lead and let up. It's only human nature to let up."

Brannon Lancaster opened the barrage by hitting a three-pointer from just left of the key. The Hawks, who shot close to 80 percent for the opening ten minutes parlayed a tough defense into easy transition baskets in jumping to the early lead.

"You know as a coach you just can't shoot that well for the game," McPherson added. "We failed to adjust. We had some success in the transition game and when we were forced to set up the half court offense, we couldn't."

Lancaster, who sat out during a four minute run in which the lead was cut from 18 to four, agreed.

"We came out aggressively," he said. "We were up 18 and expected to blow them out. Right now we just have to regroup."

The Hawks momentarily regrouped following a lively halftime speech, quickly pushing the lead back to double figures within the opening five minutes as Lancaster connected from the left side.

But just like in the opening period, they saw their lead disappear as Tech ran off 16 unanswered points while holding the Hawks scoreless over a four minute stretch to take a 68-66 lead on Earl Wise's two free throws with under nine minutes remaining in the game.

"We played in spurts tonight," said Lancaster.

"We simply lost the fire in our eyes. We came out the second half, got the lead and then played lackadaisical. We kept playing in five-minute lulls and it cost us."

Milost Babic, a seven-footer from Czechoslovakia, hit both ends of a one-and-one to give Tech its biggest lead, 72-66 with 9:20 remaining.

UNCW cut the lead to three several times and to one on Howard's jumper off a fast break with 2:02 remaining but could never regain the lead.

Howard hit two free throws with ten seconds left to narrow the gap to 81-80 and after Anthony Avery missed the front end of a one-and-one with eight seconds left Tech recovered as Lancaster dove to save the ball after a wild scramble.

Avery was then fouled again and his two free throws accounted for the 83-80 final score.

Tech was led by Wise's game-high 29 points and Babic's 22 points and team-high 13 rebounds.

Robinson Leads UNCW

BY MAI NGUYEN
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

Those sliding Seahawks are definitely on their way to a successful season. The UNCW ice hockey team defeated the local Pool Specialists and the College Road Animal Hospital during the past week to hold a 3-0 overall record.

Although both teams went into the game undefeated, UNCW was able to ultimately claim the number one spot in the league. The first period of the game progressed slowly for both teams as UNCW let the Hospital slip by a goal. As the second period advanced, Jeff Silverman, president of the club, noted that "the players finally got their act together."

With fresh substitutions, the UNCW icehaws wore the stamina of the older opponents out. The game ended with a final 7-3 score, with four of the goals made by outstanding player Eric Robinson. Robinson executed the plays efficiently, outmaneuvering his foes with quick and calculated precision. Carl Potter also exhibited great skill as he assisted Robinson with accurate passes.

Lady Hawks Split Games

TASHA ROONE
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

The Lady Seahawks traveled to South Carolina for a 80-77 victory over Coastal Carolina on Thursday January 26. However, luck didn't follow them to Minges Coliseum on January 28 against East Carolina's Lady Pirates as they fell to the Pirates 87-69.

Coastal Carolina was a third straight win for the Lady Hawks. Charlene Page came through as top scorer and rebounder. Page put up twenty-two points and pulled down nine rebounds to lead the team to victory. Unfortunately, Pages' position again as top scorer and rebounder didn't induce a win against East Carolina on Saturday Night.

Bouncing right back the Lady Seahawks are pretty optimistic about the upcoming weekend, in which they will be on the road to play William and Mary Saturday and Richmond on Monday, February 6.

When the Lady Hawks first met with the Tribe this season, they won a close one by two points. This win followed the 75-68 loss against Richmond's Lady Spiders. Hope they can defeat the Tribe again and kill the Spiders this time.

Focus on Drug Awareness Week

Drug Abuse Is Changing...

BY BRUCE FOLEY

STAFF WRITER

With the drug revival of the 1960s, "Turn on and tune in" represented the attitude of American college campuses. The arrival of the 1980s thrust the problems of drug use into the limelight, shattering all previous misconceptions about their value as a panacea.

Attitudes have changed. The reasons have changed. But the abuse continues to be a very real aspect of the college environment, UNCW being no exception.

Substance abuse counselor, Dee Hamilton, works with the student population through the Health and Wellness Center and helps confront the drug problem at UNCW. Having only worked at UNCW as a counselor for a year, Hamilton has a full schedule of student appointments every day.

"There is no denying the drug problem that exist on campus, I see it every day. However, from what I can tell UNCW seems fairly typical of the national norm," said Hamilton.

According to a Cape Fear Substance Abuse Center report, drug use has decreased by 10% among college age people since 1983, however, Hamilton does not believe such studies are very accurate due to the fact that students often lie in these surveys.

"The highest use of illegal drugs such as marijuana and cocaine seems to have reached its peak a couple of years ago, and it has slightly decreased (but) this is not to say that there have been any dramatic changes though," said Hamilton.

Upon inquiring about advice concerning drug use in the Alternatives! Center, students are often referred to Hamilton for consultation. Students who are found guilty on drug charges are also required to appear for counseling as well as a drug assessment.

Students on campus use drugs for a variety of reasons: social, recreational and therapeutic uses are the most common.

An anonymous senior who has used drugs since he was seventeen years old commented, "As a freshman [at UNCW], I was exposed to cocaine, LSD, mushrooms, XTC, and marijuana. The same is true for most of the people I surrounded myself with. During that time, my grades dropped significantly."

"My reasons for doing drugs are relatively simple: my new found freedom as a freshman and a lack of identity [fostered] peer pressure. Although, I did drugs for experimentation as well."

According to this senior, his drug use was extensive, bordering on a habitual cycle. "I was doing drugs of some sort on a daily basis, often staying up to 4 or 5 am. It was just too much fun. That is why my grades suffered; not so much from the drugs themselves but from a lack of attendance in class."

...And A Student Reveals Abuse

EDITOR'S NOTE: This article was written with assistance and information from a UNCW student. The SEAHAWK does not condone drug use; we are simply giving a real case of local drug abuse.

BY RICK HEYMANN

NEWS EDITOR

It was the fall of 1985. An anonymous freshman used to wake up with a joint lit between his lips before the usual quick shower and the rush to get to class. He would often wake up to foggy thoughts about the night before.

"I would set my mind on instant replay and review the previous night's events; the drinking, the girls, drugs and the money I wanted," he says. He partied every night, trying desperately to fit in with the drug-abusing socialites that accompanied his new found freedom at college.

Since those early years of reckless abandon at UNCW, he now awakes at 8:00 am with a clear head. Presently a senior, he now has an acceptable GPA and stays in shape, yet still indulges in random drug use occasionally. "I don't do drugs as often. I don't follow a habitual pattern like I used to," he says.

As a freshman, his first semester's GPA got him placed on warning; the second semester's grades got him an unwelcome leave from UNCW for a period of one semester. "After I failed out, I thought about what I was going to do next. I couldn't tell my parents that I did a lot of drugs. That would crush them," he says.

It appears as though he regrets the indirect affects that drugs had on his academic performance, but not the memories. "I'll never forget the good times I have had [with drugs], but now that I have established clearer goals, drugs are not the focus of my life anymore."

"I don't think that the drugs themselves caused my failure [in school]," he maintains. He seems to think that the long nights out at parties and the hangovers he endured ruined his attendance record in class, which in turn caused his grades to plummet.

Absenteeism can certainly taint a student's record with "F's", but more often than not, a lack of studying can be attributed to the failing grades. This ex-drug abuser explains, "I soon found myself in a rut. No motivation, purpose or direction in my life soon led me to [scholastic failure]."

"I not only did the drugs that I used in high school, but I also experimented and enjoyed new drugs that my friends in college introduced [to me]," he says.

The drugs that he has used habitually at some time or another in his 23 years include marijuana, cocaine, valium, alcohol, mushrooms (psilocybin), acid, nitrous oxide gas, and XTC (ecstasy). "I never used heroin. I don't think I'll ever shoot up for a buzz. I think that is the only drug that I haven't used, with the exception of angel dust (PCP)," he says.

When asked why he did not use PCP or heroin, he confidently states, "I rationalized. I had enough sense to tell the difference between good and bad."

He mentions his drugs came from friends that he made over his first 2 years at UNCW. "I never really dealt drugs for profit. I just used them, acquiring them from my friends who knew the big drug dealers on and around campus."

"I never lived in the dorms, but a lot of the drugs that I used came from there," he says. "I'd say there was an equal amount of drugs in the dorms as in the student apartments [that surround campus]."

Campus Changes To Raise Fees

BY SUSIE WITKEGE

STAFF WRITER

UNCW students better get ready: the room and board fees are going to increase next fall. The fee increase will pay for the new cafeteria and two dormitories that are now under construction.

Ironically, the administration is increasing the fees to make living on-campus more attractive. The fees will increase ten percent of the current rates.

According to the 1988-89 catalogue the fees for this year were $1385 to live in an apartment with a 21 meal plan and $1260 to live in a residence hall with a 21 meal plan. Next fall with a 21 meal plan it will cost $1503 to live in an apartment, $1388 to live in a residence hall, $1478 for a suite room, and $1553 for the new dorm rooms. The increase will also affect the students that live off-campus. Their meal plans will cost $528, $553, and $578 respectively.

The two new dormitories will be completed and ready for occupancy in August 1989. By November 1989 the new $4.8 million cafeteria will be ready to serve meals in addition to the campus' present cafeteria.

According to officials, the university is competing with off-campus housing. The administration hopes to make on-campus housing more attractive to students.

"I do not think other universities in the UNC system are increasing enrollment and campus facilities as much as we are here at UNCW," said Charlie Maimonie, Associate Dean of Students for Residence Life. "UNCW is in the middle of the UNC system of room and board costs. We are not out of live with other universities."

Each dormitory will house only 30 students. The first suite style is a 10 person suite with 4 double rooms and two single rooms. The second style suite will include 10 single rooms. Both styles include a living, dining, and a small kitchen area.

Sophomore Keith McNeill who lives on-campus said "the reason I like living on-campus is because you meet a lot more people than if you were staying off-campus. You are surrounded by people the majority of the time."

"UNCW Residence Life is trying to make the on-campus housing facilities more enticing to encourage on-campus living. (We) feel students who live on-campus benefit greatly from college life as a whole," said Maimonie.

The administration hopes that the new dorms will be more attractive to many students who in the past have not liked the cramped quarters with community bathroom facilities that most dorms offer. With fewer residents these dorms will offer similar off-campus qualities.

Keaggy & Stonehill Bring 'Live Aid' Feeling to UNCW

With Hands Across America and Band-Aid, fund raisers and consciousness-raising experiences have, in the recent past, become très vogue. UNCW will soon be the site for one of these much sought after experiences. Musicians Phil Keaggy and Randy Stonehill will be performing in a World Hunger Benefit Concert Thursday, March 2 at 7:30 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium. The benefit is sponsored by the Association of Campus Entertainment Concerts Committee, Campus Crusade for Christ, and Wilmington Area Youth Groups. Opening act for the concert will be British comedy team, Phil and John. Half of the proceeds will go to Compassion International and will be used to feed and clothe children in Haiti. Both Keaggy and Stonehill are renowned recording artists. Keaggy is a world-class guitarist who first gained fame in the late sixties with the band: Glass Harp, Synergy, and It Makes Me Glad. Phil left Glass Harp in 1972 and released the first of many solo albums two years later.

In addition to being a popular performer, Randy Stonehill is a gifted composer who writes almost all of his own music. His albums include Ecuador, Celebrate This Heartbeat, Love Beyond Reason, The Wild Frontier, and Can't Buy a Miracle. Stonehill has written with Keith Green and recorded a duet with Amy Grant called "I Could Never Say Goodbye." Stonehill says, "Phil and I are excited to be able to tour together this year." In addition to their friendship, both artists are bound together by their interest in helping needy children. Keaggy and Stonehill have each traveled in third world countries with Compassion International and are strong supporters of the organization. Tickets for the concert are on sale at the University Union Information Center and at Cox Christian Bookstores. Advance tickets are $2 for students and $4 for all others. Any ticket remaining on the day of the show will be available at the door for $3 and $5 for students and others respectively.

Jazz-A-Ma-Tazz for Children

Public Service Announcement - Carolina Jazz Jubilee. During Black History Month, Jazz - A - Ma - Tazz will begin the Carolina Jazz Jubilee Series, four presentations featuring outstanding minority jazz musicians from North Carolina. The artists were selected based on their high level of musicianship, commitment to the art form and ability to communicate with children. The first presentation will be held on Saturday, February 11th at the Community Boys' Club, 901 Nixon Street and is sponsored by Coca-Cola Bottling Works and E.I. DuPont. The guest artist is Nnenna Freelon, a jazz vocalist from Durham, who performs with the Scott Sawyer Trio and conducts vocal workshops at Duke for teens.

A free children's workshop will be held from 2-3 p.m., followed by a concert of the general public from 4-5 p.m. Adults will be asked to donate $3.00. Jazz videos will be shown between performances and hot dogs and cokes will be on sale.

To Kill a Mockingbird Plays

The Thalian Association community theatre will stage a production of Harper Lee's Pulitzer Prize-winning play, TO KILL A MOCKINGBIRD, February 15th through 18th at 8pm and February 19th at the Community Arts Center at Second and Orange Streets in historic downtown Wilmington. The play, directed by Geoff Honaker, will feature the combined talents of 26 volunteer performers from the Wilmington area. Settings for the play have been designed by Hunter Thompson.

Tickets are $10 and students, senior citizens, and groups of 10 or more will receive a $2 discount. Box office opens Monday, February 6th and reservations may be made by calling 763-3398 or 763-9328 daily, Monday through Saturday, from 10am until 5:30pm. Tickets may also be purchased from the box office which is located at 118 Princess Street.

Playwrights Group To Meet

WILMINGTON - The Playwright Producing Company will hold its February meeting at The Terrace Inn on Market St. at 7:30 pm on Wednesday, Feb. 8.

New York Ed., a one act play by local playwright Ross Federico, will read at the meeting. Various Company members will read the characters in Federico's script to make it come alive. New comers are invited to attend the reading.

The Playwrights Producing Company is a group of playwrights dedicated to enhancing the professionalism of local stage and screen writers. Each month a member's play is read by the Company. Once a year members are invited to submit their best works to be staged and performed for the public.

The submission deadline for one act plays this year is FEBRUARY 15. Newcomers may submit a play by attending the Feb 8 meeting and paying the yearly dues of $10. The plays will be judged by three professional judges who are not members of The Playwrights Producing Company.

Since the company is relatively new to the Wilmington theatre community, the group is also SEEKING A LOGO to give them a recognizable identity. If you have artistic ability and would like to submit a logo to The Playwrights Producing Company, call Kay Swink at 763-7922. The deadline is April 1, 1989.

Join the Lost Colony Crew Summer '89

America's longest running outdoor drama gears up for its 49th production season as plans are announced for auditioning the more than 100 actors, singers, dancers and technicians needed to stage Paul Green's The Lost Colony on Roanoke Island on the Outer Banks of North Carolina.

Audition will be held at the show's headquarters on Roanoke Island near Manteo on Saturday, February 25th. Auditions will also be held with other outdoor dramas in Chapel Hill on the University of North Carolina Campus when the Institute of Outdoor Drama holds its annual auditions on Saturday, March 4th.

Actors and singers should report for the Manteo auditions on February 25th at 10 a.m. and prepare a one-minute vocal piece (bring sheet music for piano).

No preparation is required for children's auditions at 2 p.m. Children must be old enough to read.

Dancers audition at 3 p.m. and participate in a dance movement class.

Technicians apply at 3 p.m. for a brief interview. All must bring a resume and provide two black-and-white photos (head and shoulder pose).

Salary range is $110 to $200 per week. Limited housing is

Style Kills Substance in 80's

Great Yahweh....What has happened? The 80's roared by like a steam locomotive. Yes, it's 1989 and I'm very scared indeed. If the 70's was the "ME" decade, then what in Living Hell can we call the 80's? The 80's just might be the decade in which STYLE Finally Killed SUBSTANCE.

Hell yes, I'm guilty myself! It's easy to be sucked into the STYLE KING set, thus becoming a member of The Flock of Shallow. AHHR....to be in 1989 is a tempting feeling....especially if you were actually 19 in 1981! Of course, you know you're in Big Trouble when you start referring to "1981" as "those great 'ole early 80's." Unfortunately, I have begun to sense an ever-widening gap between the typical college freshman today, compared to the freshman of "those great 'ole early 80's."

It seems as if there's a new breed of youth who possess little drive, care no deeper than the surface level. These beings are a strange bunch indeed, for they don't seem to be moved by much of anything. To them, Life must resemble a FLASH FIRE which appears to burn BIG and BRIGHT....but for only a second. After this second of brilliance is up, they quickly become Bored and uninterested. To keep the flame lit, they must be shocked, surprised, and entertained continuously. Unfortunately, this can only be accomplished by bigger, better, louder, brighter, WEIRDER, and STRANGER input! They need input to shock the mind into movement; where it once required a few volts, it now NEEDS thousands....GOD, this appears to be a never-ending cycle that can only become worse.

The problem is the inability to stick with anything past the initial excitement of the flash fire; there's no Will to keep going on to the next level of understanding that REALLY brings the enjoyment. There is a complete lack of solidity or Base. Without this BASE, the person will inevitably be grasping for straws. By the time they come to their senses, they're BANK LOAN OFFICERS in Butte, Montana.

There are many symptoms exhibited by individuals locked into this mind warp. Most run through hobbies and interests like a revolving pinwheel, without ever moving past the initial stages. They are constantly in search of something to give MEANING to their lives, but are quickly bored by everything they try. They achieve meaning and significance through the worship of style and trends which are constantly changing. Some don't even reach this stage; they appear almost Lifeless and resemble all the excitement of a lump of dough.

Unfortunately, there is no instant cure. One must begin total erasure of everything experienced since the age of three. After this drastic step, I can only recommend a steady diet of Bulgur wheat, yeast, and plenty of ZINC.... And pray for Deliverance in the 90's.

UNCW Telefund Raises Over $50,000

BY KAREN ROYE
STAFF WRITER

The 1989 UNCW Telefund has come to a close, the goal of $50,000 was surpassed by over $53,000, and there are almost a thousand donors out there experiencing those "warm and fuzzy feelings."

The warm and fuzzy feelings are what a person gets when they support their alma mater. During the last three weeks, UNCW students have been soliciting funds from UNCW alumni.

In an earlier interview, Howard Lipman, executive director of resource development and supervisor of the annual telefund, stated that "the funds that are raised will be added to the Alumni Annual Fund and used for funding scholarships, faculty research, academic enrichment, and much more."

Because of the solicitation efforts during the recent telefund, $53,899.61 will be added to the Annual Fund. Lipman knew that "the goal of $50,000 was attainable, although we all had to work hard to reach it. It is proof that UNCW has the ability to take great steps forward as far as the alumni are concerned."

The interest displayed by the alumni was tremendous. Lipman calculated that 53% of those who gave during the telefund had never donated to the university in the past.

"It is important that we increase our donor base, because if we build a broad base of support, we can continue to gain support from others. All of the thanks goes to the student volunteers from different fraternities, sororities, and other student organizations," he said.

Those organizations that participated are Alpha Phi Omega, Alpha Phi, Alpha Delta Pi, Delta Tau Delta, Delta Sigma Phi, Delta Sigma Theta, and Ambassadors. "I also could not have done it without the Ambassador Alumni Captains. They were the key to the success," said Lipman.

Rob Lackey, a senior at UNCW and Chief Telefund Coordinator for Ambassadors, was responsible for choosing captains for each night of the funds drive. "The night captains consisted of Ambassadors that were very energetic and hard working. [The Telefund] wouldn't have been such a success without their hard work," Lackey said.

Lackey added that he was "quite impressed with the level of enthusiasm that was demonstrated by each organization that participated."

Lou Diccillo, a senior Business major, participated in the Telefund as a member of Delta Tau Delta fraternity. He worked six out of the ten nights that the telefund was held, and ended up as the grand prize winner on All-Star night.

All-Star Night was held on the last night of the drive, and only those who had displayed excellent enthusiasm and telemarketing ability were invited to attend. On this night, callers started out with equal dollar amount and continuously called the alumni seeking pledges. Prizes were awarded to the top four callers.

A UNCW coffee mug was awarded to senior Camille Bigner, fourth place. Wendy Todd, who finished in third place was awarded a pair of Oakley sun glasses. Second prize, a dinner for two at The Bridgeender Restaurant, was awarded to Jennifer Stanczewski, and the Grand Prize Winner was Lou Diccillo.

"I won a dinner for two at Eight-eleven Mercer Restaurant and a limousine for the evening. I am simply delighted!" says Diccillo.

This is the third consecutive year that Diccillo has participated in the Telefund. Last year he was also top caller, having raised $5,000. This year he surpassed that by over $1,000.

About the Telefund, Diccillo said that "[the calling] is addictive and fun. I got the opportunity to talk to a lot of different people and learn how to handle many different situations, depending upon who I was talking to. You've got to be quick and confident, analyze what's going on, and react. You can be whoever you want to be over the phone; nobody can see you and it really is fun."

Andrea Piner and Kelli Rossi, night captains agree, "We raised a lot more money than what we had expected, and had a lot of fun doing it!"

Hands-On Research Offered

(UNCW NEWS) -- Wilmington-Students at The University of North Carolina at Wilmington will have the opportunity to participate in hands-on research through a grant of $93,708 from the National Science Foundation. The purpose of the research is to look at chromosomes to determine genetic relationships to seaweed.

The research project, under the direction of Dr. Donald F. Kapraun, professor of biology at UNCW, is titled "RUI: Cytogenetic and Microspectrophotometric Investigations of Multinucleate Marine Green Algae." The NSF grant will fund two academic years of research.

UNCW marine biology majors Todd Kelland Hinson of Asheville, Stephanie K. Clendennen of Wilmington, and Jeffery Craig Baily of Bluefield, WV, will be assisting in the research.

Hinson, a graduate of A.C. Reynolds High School where he was a National Merit Semifinalist, is president of the UNCW Biology Club and is a member of the Collegiate Academy of the M.C. Academy of Sciences.

Clendennen is a UNCW Herbert W. Mintzes Memorial Scholar, a Houston Underwater Club Sea/Space Scholar and a member of the Phi Kappa Phi Honor Society.

Baily, a graduate of Princeton Senior High School in Princeton, WV, was a member of the National Honor Society and a Science Award Winner. He is a UNCW Bookstore Scholar, a UNCW Research Fellow and has been included in Outstanding College

Students of America.

With UNCW's growth over the years, the need for increased research capabilities in the marine biology area has expanded.

"It is my belief that our primary mission is to teach our undergraduate students," said Kapraun. "However, I feel that a significant and important part of their education should involve direct research experience. This funding will enable our students to conduct research while at the same time experience hands-on training."

In addition to funds from the National Science Foundation, Kapraun has received $12,900 in support of this work from the Research Corporation, a foundation for the advancement of science and technology. This will fund a summer research project.

Temporary Employment For Quick Money

BY CAROL TREMBLAY
STAFF WRITER

Here's a familiar scenario--Saturday night comes rolling around and you want to go out. The only problem is that the last $10 you had went into a pizza and a six-pack on Friday night!

Maybe you need the money you would get from a part time job, but don't have the time to dedicate to a day-to-day grind. Working for a temporary service may be the answer.

Wilmington has plenty of temporary employment agencies to choose from with jobs to match your skills and interests.

They contract with attorneys, accountants, security brokers, retail establishments, and large manufacturing companies for positions such as office automation, light industrial assembly, clerical, and technical work.

Margaret Justice of JCPenney says she calls "When we do not have the sufficient help," usually in retail or for inventory.

Alumnus Leaves $2.7 Mil For Students To "Party Hearty"

(CPS)--Alumni make large gifts to their schools to endow professorships, build buildings, recruit minorities or maybe even reward football coaches.

But Roosevelt University, a small private liberal arts college in the middle of Chicago, just got a cash gift aimed at helping students have a good time.

Alumnus Marvin Moss's estate donated $2.75 million January 18 -- the largest gift in the school's 43-year history -- but stipulated it must be used to help the students "party hearty."

Moss, who was the agent for movie stars Shirley MacLaine, Desi Arnaz and "Rocky" director John Avildsen, died of cancer in Los Angeles in 1986. His will, as it turned out, specified that the bulk of his estate was to go to Roosevelt University.

Moss had reasoned that "as a city-type school, I never felt students socialized as much as they might have."

The university will use the money to build a gymnasium and fitness center, renovate student lounges and create a student activities fund, said Roosevelt's president, Theodore Gross.

The students at Roosevelt had varied ideas as to how the money should be used.

"They should have parties at nice hotels and get a DJ who knows how to play a really good music," said Beatrice Franklin, a junior in Biology.

Junior Daryl McLaurine had a more basic suggestion. "We need better food."

Moss, a 1948 graduate of Roosevelt, donated a "model" sum to the school each year "and we tried to convince him to contribute more," said Robert Shepard, vice president for development. "He told us, 'Don't worry you're in my will and someday you'll be rich.'"

Moss's will also bequeathed the University of California his wine cellar.

There are many advantages to working with these services too.

Sandra Youngblood of Norrell says that gaining more experience from working in these jobs "make students more marketable for us, and more marketable period."

And Norrell has an added advantage. On designated work days that no jobs are available, they can cross-train you in word processing, spread sheets, and data processing. This is a free service they offer to their employees.

Another reason to look into one of these temporary agencies is the pay. Small jobs can range from $4 to $5 an hour, while larger jobs requiring more skills -- such as office automation processing -- can pay from $8 to $10 (and up) an hour. Some even offer special benefits like vacation plans and health insurance.

Some companies may even hire the temporary help for permanent positions. Norrell has about 70% of their employees to clients offering permanent jobs.

These agencies will also try to work with your schedule. They usually have calls from companies wanting workers for 8 am to 5 pm, but there are exceptions.

Youngblood says, "We are here to cater to the students -- if they have days to work, they can come in." The best days are when you have no classes scheduled.

Most agencies encourage college students to work during their free time and holidays.

The President of Temps & Co., Jay Kinlaw, is "expecting a surge of business" in the summer months when students have more free time.

According to Cindie Finley, Personnel Coordinator, Temps & Co. expects to do some heavy recruiting of UNCW students that will be here over the summer.

Although Temps & Co. is relatively new to the area, they have pride in feeling like a valuable service.

Kinlaw feels that his company has "more of an interest in UNCW students than any other temporary service in town." They have put a lot of money and time into recruiting these students, and plan to do more as summer nears. Along with Forever Tan and School Kids, Temps sent out direct mail fliers advertising their service to the students of UNCW.

He enjoys working with college students because he feels "they prove to be very dependable" when it comes to overall job obligations.

Not only do we, as employees of these companies, provide a service to the Wilmington job market, but what we, as students, can gain from working in a part time job far outweighs the loss of some free time -- and the benefits are unmeasurable.

What's Threatening Our NC Beaches

Are you looking forward to summer?! That's half of what we come to UNCW for... to lay in the sun, to surf, to take our dates to the beach with a bottle of Korbel and watch the sunset fade into stars.

You probably don't realize that some of our state legislators are getting ready to defile our brilliant coastland...yes, UNCW beachbums, that means BEACH. And don't let them fool you; it isn't Bush's republicans who are wanting to do the damage.

The democrats from the counties bordering the coastline are bucking two proposals resulting from a legislative study of coastal water quality; one to extend the landward area around the coast's best waters, and the other to limit the number of developers who sit on the Coastal Resources Commission.

It seems many of the Representatives of these counties are more concerned about the wealth in their own communities (and possibly in their own pockets?) and are willing to sacrifice some of the state's finest oyster beds for a little extra development in their areas.

The coastal study committee proposed last year to expand the environmental concern area around outstanding resource waters from the current 75 feet to 575 feet. Although development in these areas does require a special permit, the Reps are worried about closing down the contractors in their areas (who are their 'constituents'), posing the money their high rises and condos bring to the sleepy little towns--which subsist on the shellfish beds--as the primary reason for rejecting the proposal.

It is sickening that so many people place their own American Dream above the value of the American Dreams of all the following generations. If this proposal fails, it will sacrifice the dreams of the people who enjoy the unspoiled coastline, not to mention those who make their living off the shellfish industry. Have these Reps considered the hazard to the state economy hurting that industry would provide? Is the temporary benefit of a quickened pulse in the local economy be worth the long range effects?

Some of the Reps argued that the shellfish beds are doing well under the current conditions, and this is true. But for how long? With pollutants increasing in our local waters, and the threat of red tide, shouldn't we be doing all we can to protect those waters?

Enough rhetorical questions. We should care enough about Wilmington to care about all the coastline affected by this proposal, from Virginia to South Carolina. Get involved in local clean ups, pay attention to local legislation, and write your State Rep.

Because maybe if we like Wilmington enough, we'll want to bring our friends to the same sensational beaches we have for more than just the years we go to UNCW. Or be ready to bring your garbage bag, your chemical insulation suit, and a camera to take pictures of the beautiful hotels.

Clarifications and Corrections

The Seahawk would like to make a correction that applies to last week's editorial, "In Defense of Fulfilling Obligation." In the editorial Robert Smith's salary was reported to have been $250/ month, his actual salary is $200/month. The original figure of $250 was what was told to us by a source in the SGA.

Living By

Give me fifteen percent or give me more! Anyone who has ever waited tables should be able to identify this cry. If you have ever lived by the tip, you know that you die by the tip also.

I toiled for a few years waiting tables in Austin, Texas. I worked at many different restaurants. (I tire of a job easily). Just about every variety of customer has sat at my station at one time or another and I remember them well. So, all I've got to say to you poor tippers, or God forbid you slugs that don't tip, is, you deserve death by white cutters.

Many establishments insist that you're not a waiter or waitress, but a "server". The various riff-raff that come to the restaurant aren't customers, but guests. To me, many times they were just overgrown lipid cells lacking discernible brainwaves.

The best part of the job was CASH!! Every time you worked--you received cash, but it's a long way to the bank. I always worked the evening shift, and I know that when you

When change is imminent people can do nothing but react to it. They either go on with their old ways or they change. Oftentimes it takes a great effort to institute change. Luckily we live in a society that does change. One of the few in the world that does let the people voice their opinions.

The old adage about America not being perfect, but being better than anything else is particularly true even on the university level.

The student body complained at nauseum about the parking problem and having nowhere to park so much that eventually parking spaces were taken away and given to the faculty. (This is not a direct cause and effect, but it is true.)

Students complained about being forced to purchase a meal plan when living on campus even though they have full kitchens in the apartments so auxiliary services increased the cost of meal plans.

And now the school has banned smoking in public buildings. I personally was impressed that the school's administration took such a noble stance on the issue. But the proposal has fallen short of its goals.

My understanding of the ban was that there would be designated smoking areas for smokers in each building. I haven't yet noticed any unless that means that smokers are supposed to smoke outside of the buildings.

One need only look outside the entrances to any of the buildings on campus to see hundreds of smashed cigarette butts strewn about on the ground. It's disgusting!

Another problem with the policy is that a select few students seem to think that the signs in the building were meant for other people not including themselves. I initially tried to convince myself that these unfortunate dolts couldn't read the signs. But the truth is that they can and they don't mind being jerks about their habit. (Incidentally "passive smoke" is harmful to others. Cadmium levels alone coming from the end of a burning cigarette are five times higher than the smoke inhaled by the smoker.)

We, as humans, should take a good look at these kind of people. Their arrogance truly gives reason to believe that we are indeed self-serving, greedy morons.

Finally there is the issue of where smoking is allowed, in the cafeteria for instance.

I've been here for almost four years and have eaten in the cafeteria every semester during that period of time (sad, but true). It's bad enough that I have to eat there, but now that smokers smoke less in other buildings they tend to smoke more in the cafeteria. This added seasoning makes the food taste even worse. I don't particularly care for Marlboro flavored ravioli or Salem seasoned soup.

If you want to have a bad habit, like smoking, that's fine. Everybody has them whether it be smoking, drinking, dipping, or biting nails. But let it be your habit, don't force it on everyone else.

Also if you have to put your butts somewhere, put them in the trash that's what they are. Those filters on the cigarettes aren't the most biodegradable substance around, and cigarette butts are just as disgusting as dip spit.

Someone somewhere in this wonderful institution of ours ought to take a look and smell the (cough) roses once (gasp) in a while. If nothing (choke) else they might just see (whee) that there's more to this smoking problem than meets the lungs.

Person Power Still Prevails In This World

Since the news media keeps us so conscious of every tragedy in our world and the incredible immensity of so many problems like hunger, the pollution of the oceans, the diminishment of the ozone layer and on and on, it is easy to feel overwheeled and become resigned to a sense of person powerlessness.

The feeling that "its all too much for me" seems to be the norm among people whose main goal has become a good pay job that provides comfort and freedom from stress. As Edmund Burke, 18th century statesman noted, "the only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing."

In reality, an individual can make a significant difference. Rosa Parks refused to move to the rear of the bus and sparked a civil rights revolution. Dr. Jonas Salk engaged in dogged but routine research day in and day out and developed a vaccine that spelled the end of polio.

Lech Welesa, a simple Polish worker became the force behind the Solidarity movement and won the Nobel Peace Prize.

All these demonstrated the truth of an ancient Chinese proverb: "It is better to light one candle than to curse darkness." Even a tiny flame eliminates the darkness; the simplest kindness contributes to a better world. You are a person who can make a difference, who can add one more small light in the world of increasing darkness.

A person who lights candles feeds one hungry neighbor instead of lamenting world hunger; casts one intelligent vote instead of cursing corruption in government; keeps his or her own room clean rather than grumbling about litter in the hall; offers one prayer for peace in place of endless complaints about war and is a quiet doer rather than a noisy complainer.

The people mentioned above had no idea that they would make such an impact on our world. They simply cared deeply and did those actions that were appropriate to their own personal life--and values. The only real difference between them and us is that they did, in fact, act.

On the day her teenage daughter was struck and killed by a drunk driver, Candy Lightner in California vowed to bring meaning into her daughter's needless death. She founded MADD ( Mothers Against Drunk Driving). Her organization has made a significant difference in our legal response to drunk driving and in awareness of the issue.

You too can make a difference right where you are. It simply calls for one act of kindness or concern in response to the needs of friends and family who surround you, the needs of your community or the incredible needs brought to you through the media.

I agree with the father James Keller, who founded the Christophers; "the mere fact that you are alive reading these words, no matter your age, the state of your health or physical condition, means that you have been chosen by God to perform some work that no other person can do."

If you wish to leave the world better than you found it, you must be convinced that you have been put here for a purpose, delegated by God in however small a way, to play a part in renewing the face of the earth."

It is up to you. Light a small candle today.

The Tip And Having Something To Say

get a group of servers together at midnight, with a pocketful of cash--there's going to be some major partying going on.

The worst part of the job is a toss-up. It's either management or the obnoxious "guests". Most managers are Dinks. On the evolutionary scale, we have Neanderthal man restaurant managers (Dinkus Erectus) on down to homo sapiens.

I've seen restaurants that were so busy that they were beginning to fall apart. Everyone running around trying to get food out, the food supply gradually depleting to nothing, and a long waiting list, and what is the manager doing? Snooping around to catch a server sneaking a french fry, measuring earring lengths to make sure that they are within proper guidelines, and bitching about a spot on the wall.

The obnoxious guests come in all shapes and sizes. The worst is the middle aged women from hell. Four or more of them at a table is enough to ruin your day. You know the first words that will come out of their mouths, in unison, "Separate Checks Please!" You know what they want to drink--water. 15% of 0-0. Then they will proceed to order the cheapest thing on the menu (often from the child's menu, if they can get away with it). Once they get their food, they start to whine about everything. That's when a grenade comes in handy. When they finally leave--you can hear the change sliding and drooping on the table.

I'm sure that you have heard rumors about servers spitting in the food of the ruses whom they don't like or have stiffed them in the past. Well, I've never witnessed anyone doing that. (Besides me of course.) I was always a tad unorthodox as a waiter. I would occasionally answer "No" to their petty requests. Once, some jerk-off yelled, "Hey, waiter." I yelled back, "What, customer?"

My best put-down of a guest was when some needy-faced guy came in with his wife and another couple. You know the type. He continually made stupid jokes and thought he was hilarious. After I took his order, he said, "You know Rick, I'm strictly a ten percent man." I replied, "What are you? Ninety percent woman?" It shut him up for the rest of the night. I could tell that the other three loved it, and they tipped me well for it.

Other dimwits who will drive a server crazy are Campers. These are the fools who don't leave. They take up your table for hours while sucking down coffee by the potful and smoking their brains out. The server will be thinking, "Listen you scum-faced weasel, I'll pour this coffee down your pants and watch you dance if you don't get the hell out of here."

The server is already pissed, and then they get it from the cooks. When the campers finish eating, they are oblivious to the fact that they are the only ones in the place. They always order coffee. A subtle server will tell them that there isn't any and they'd have to brew a new pot. The honeydew-heads will say the dreaded words, "That's alright, we aren't in a hurry." If you think that it doesn't take total control of one's faculties, not to scream, "Sit on your thumbs and rotate, while I make it!" then you have no idea of what it is to wait on tables.

Despite paychecks for negative twenty dollars and obnoxious managers and guests, it's not totally bad. It beats digging a ditch and you make many friends and have some great parties. Not working forty hours a week isn't so bad either.

Tougher Smoking Restrictions Announced On Campuses

BY MICHAEL O'KEEFE
COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

(CPS) - It's getting harder to be a cigarette smoker on American campuses.

A number of schools have announced even tougher smoking restrictions in recent weeks. From Big Bend Community College in Washington state to the East Coast, campuses that began limiting student smoking as long as a decade ago have taken the last big step this school year.

"Smoking is pretty much banned now" at Big Bend, spokesman Doug Sly reported of new rules implemented Jan. 1.

"Smoking is pretty much banned now."

In 1976, Penn State University was one of the first U.S. campuses to ban smoking from its laboratories and classrooms. On April 1 of this year, it will forbid smoking everywhere except certain dorm rooms.

"It's too strict of a rule. I have a smoking habit and I don't feel like standing out in the rain or snow (to smoke)," said Penn State senior Mary Helen Moran.

Stanford university in 1988 banned smoking even at outdoor events.

"Some colleges have been setting the pace" said Dr. John Longest, the American College Health Association (ACHA) official who has led efforts to combat smoking on campuses for several decades.

The drumbeat of new restrictions has been constant.

Colorado's Metropolitan State College's bookstore stopped selling cigarettes in November, while Georgia State University banned such sales in 1986. Scores of other schools, including the universities of Texas, Illinois, Nebraska and North Dakota, and Tulane, Mankato State, and Southwest Missouri State universities also have restricted campus smoking.

School officials cite health concerns as the reason.

"We have practical, even moral reasons to restrict smoking," explained William Hetrick, director of Penn State's human services department.

"Colleges need to recognize young people are at a volatile point in their development of habits," said John M. Penney, executive director of Harvard's Institute for the Study of Smoking Behavior and Policy. "Colleges can influence their employees and students to ensure a healthy do MUCH BETTER in encouraging young people not to start," Longest wrote in the ACHA's policy paper on smoking which calls for tight limits on campus tobacco use and substantially increased educational efforts than less-educated citizens: the proportion of college graduates who smoked decreased from 28 percent in 1974 to 18 percent colleagues, smoke cigarettes, the annual American Council on Education - University of California at Los Angeles survey of 300,000 students found in mid-January.

"The key question is how do we get to these teenagers?" a frustrated Longest said of the survey results. "There's so much more resounding proof that smoking causes cancers, emphysema and heart disease than we had 10 years ago."

"Teens experiment," Pinney said, "and they'll stop and start again. It's not until their late teens and early twenties that they really form a habit. One year does not a trend make. But this is a signal that we haven't made as much progress as we thought."

The increase in freshman smoking, Pinney said, indicates that colleges may have to get even tougher on smokers, since efforts to keep students away from tobacco earlier in their lives apparently have not worked well.

Student smokers generally haven't resisted the latest round of restrictions very forcefully.

In 1988, University of California at Davis students protested a new non-smoking policy in the Student Union coffee shop by lighting up, but there have been few other similar protests.

"Some feel it's an infringement of their personal rights," said Hetrick, but there's been little organized protest at Penn State.

Steve Cronan of the Denver-based People for Smokers' Rights, formed to combat smoking restrictions, said he "gets calls from kids all the time" complaining about the rules.

"But the action portion of smokers' rights doesn't seem to be that important to them. Most smokers are easy-going or apathetic. It takes an atomic bomb to move them. My guess is that's even more prevalent among young people. Most of our members are in their 40s, 50s and 60s."

"There's been on backlash from students," said Longest. "If anything, students are telling their professors not to smoke."

"A few smokers are indignant, but most take it in stride," said Big Bend's Sly. "You see little groups of smokers now hanging around outside. You might hear people get more upset the colder it gets."

"Teens experiment and they'll stop and start again. It's not until their late teens and early twenties that they really form a habit."

workplace," Penney added, citing the 1986 Surgeon General's report that said second-hand smoke can lead to cancers and heart disease for nonsmokers, too.

Some feel colleges are not educating students enough, however.

"We must continue to do better in helping present smokers give up the habit and in 1985. For people without a college degree, the decrease -- from 36 percent in 1974 to 34 percent in 1985 -- was much more modest.

But even among the new campus bans, there are signs college students may be smoking again.

Some 10.1 percent of this year's freshmen, up from 8.9 percent of last year's first-year

Spring Break Sun Warnings

(DAYTONA CONVENTION & VISITORS BUREAU)

Many college students in Daytona Beach for Spring Break don't realize just how strong the sun's rays can be. After only one day of fun in the sun, they have a painful sunburn that may ruin the rest of their trip -- and their skin.

Don't let this happen to you this year. A conservative approach to sunning will assure that your remaining vacation days will be as pleasant as the first. And you can go back to school with a healthy glow instead of an itchy peel.

Because Florida is closer to the equator than many northern states, the ultra violet rays are four times faster, depending on your sun-sense. Local skin specialists, lifeguards and sun lotion manufacturers recommend the following guidelines for Spring Breakers:

Day 1 -- Use Sun Protection Factor (SPF) 15 or higher everywhere skin is exposed, especially on face and delicate areas where skin is thinnest and more sun-sensitive.

Day 2 -- Continue with the same SPF you used yesterday.

Day 3 -- If you started with a SPF higher than 15, drop down to 15. If you started with 15, stay there one more day.

Day 4 -- Depending on your natural skin tone and the color of your Florida base tan, you may move on down the SPF ladder as follows:

- Very fair to fair -- stay with SPF 15

- Fair to Medium -- Drop down to SPF 10

- Medium to light tan -- Try SPF 10 or 8

- Tan to olive skin -- Should be safe with SPF 8 or 6

- Deep tan to dark skin -- Use SPF 4

Day 5 and beyond -- Follow Day 4's advice for the rest of your stay. As your tan increases, drop your SPF gradually so that you maintain a beautiful tan with no burning or peeling.

Always keep a higher number SPF on your face. This avoids wrinkling later in life. Zinc Oxide in a rainbow of colors is a fun alternative to white lotion or oils. For an extra cool tip, pack your skin protectors in your soft drink cooler and apply when cold to soothe hot skin.

Another tip: Take a break from the sun for a day or two. There are also many indoor activities during Spring Break when the sun gets too intense.

Bradley Kicks Off Black History Month

BY PATRICE BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

When he originated the idea of Black History month, Carter G. Woodson, intended to evoke a "deeper appreciation [for] and heightened awareness of black achievements." This idea was examined Wednesday afternoon during a program recognizing February as Black History month. Master of Ceremonies, Vernon Johnson quoted Woodson during the program which was held in Room 100 of the University Union.

The program, which began at 3:30 pm, featured Dr. David Bradley, visiting professor of English, as the keynote speaker. It also featured the UNCW gospel choir (who were unable to perform due to academic scheduling problems), an art exhibit by Harry Davis, and an exhibit of African artifacts by the Museum of World Cultures of UNCW.

Dr. Bradley began his speech by saying that February being given to blacks is a "mutable gift because it is the 'shortest and weirdest month'."

Bradley spoke of the nonexistence of black history and stated that "no one claps for American history...because it is an accepted fact" and through the years people have tried to leave the bad stuff out.

Bradley also contended that there is a danger in emphasizing Black achievements. This causes Blacks to be left out of the mainstream of the "American dream," and according to Bradley, turned into the "Negro nightmare."

Bradley said "Black history must reach into the present or it will be irrelevant and we will be 'celebrating out of context'."

Bradley ended by saying blacks are after the truth and that this type of program is "only taking a step towards a goal" which is the "reclaiming of American history."

Johnson, president of Phi Beta Sigma fraternity, said "we need more than black history month and more than forums" to improve racial relations here at UNCW. He contended that we need a human relations month because black history month is basically a "pride month" for blacks, and not whites.

Johnson said Bradley's speech made him "realize that [blacks], as people, take what the majority class gives [them] for granted."

Ralph Parker, Director of Minority Affairs which sponsored the program, commented that Bradley's was a "different and innovative approach" that stressed "why black history needs to be incorporated into history itself."

Parker commended this refreshing approach to the importance of black history and said it was very academic in its message. "I would like to see the 'momentum carry on throughout the entire year."

Bradley is originally from Bedford, Penn. and is an associate professor at Temple University. He received his B.A. from the University of Pennsylvania and his Masters from Kings College, London. He is a widely published author and received the PEN/Faulkner award for his novel The Chancesville Incident.

The program featured artwork by local artist Harry Davis, who said that through his artwork he tries to project the "black experience with strength and integrity."

Additional features of the program included music by Mr. and Mrs. Steven Bradley (in lieu of the gospel choir) and a special presentation by the NAACP to the Minority Student of the Semester, Vanessa Izard.

ABUSE CHANGING

Hamilton would agree that this senior exhibited many of the classic indicators of a problem drug user. "I don't think a problem necessarily has to do with how much you do or how often, but some people have a very high tolerance to drugs [which hinders addiction]. The problem arises when drugs become the focus of your life," said Hamilton. She also inferred that often students who regularly use drugs develop problems with relationships among others.

"The effects drugs have on relationships is not always apparent. Students involved with drugs often surround themselves with other drug users, they don't want to be where the drugs are not at. This narrows us, and tends to pull us away from healthy relationships," said Hamilton.

It is often stereotyped that students involved with drugs have a low self image, are poorly motivated and are usually low achieving students. This according to Hamilton is not always true. "I don't see any correlation between a student's intelligence or how they see themselves. I know many very intelligent, high achieving people that have dependencies."

Drugs offer many different answers to students for a variety of reasons. Dee Hamilton puts much of this blame on our own society. "We are living in a very heavy drug using culture, many of which are sold to us from over the counter. People do drugs at the drop of a hat," said Hamilton.

It does not surprise me that there are a whole other group of drugs out there, that are not necessarily legal or approved of, but are still very effective for a lot of people for a short term."

An anonymous female student confides, "I smoke a little pot from time to time. It helps me to relax and sooth my tensions."

The use of cocaine as a catalyst for alertness and an overall sense of confidence is common.

"I enjoyed the way coke made me feel. I felt like nothing would bother me. It was also great for staying up at parties," said the anonymous senior.

The problem of drug abuse on the UNCW campus is not going to disappear overnight. Dee Hamilton believes that the university's policies are beneficial, in that the problem should not be attacked, but worked with.

"So often with college campuses, when a problem arises [with drugs], the attitude to get tough and put emphasis on enforcement takes over," said Hamilton.

"I like the channelling of students to my office, where I can offer honest feedback, advice, and further recommendations. I try not to be judgemental or see things in a black and white perspective."

The winter sunsets for 1989 are almost over, as Phil the Groundhog predicted on Feb. 2. (six weeks isn't too long!)

Pie Attacks Common In U.S.

In a scene out of a T.V. cop show, several class members bolted up to chase the assailant. One student, Steve Spoonmore, managed to jump into the Pie Man's getaway car, but eventually had to roll out of it while it was moving.

The Pie Man and a woman companion in the car were screaming at him and hitting him, Spoonmore said.

It wasn't the first time habits of the Waco, Texas, campus been pried this school year. Several students and professors were pried in class during first semester, but Baylor spokesman Dr. James Baker reports that the first semester Pie Man has been apprehended and punished through normal disciplinary channels.

The pie massacre in Raser's class, he concluded, had to be the work of different people.

Pie attacks were common on many campuses in the early eighties, when the weapon of choice seemed to be cream or berry pies. Professors at Michigan State University and the University of Colorado were victimized, as was the dean of students at the University of Wisconsin at Madison.

Celebrities visiting campuses in those days had to be careful, too. William F. Buckley, New York Sen. Daniel Moynihan, anti-abortionist Phyllis Schafley, former Ohio Gov. James Rhodes, Watergate conspirator E. Howard Hunt and G. Gordon Liddy, artist Andy Warhol, anti-gay rights activist and singer Anita Bryant and former CIA Director William Colby all were pried at various schools during the period.

Reactions to Baylor's pie revival varied.

Original victim Wyatt laughed it off, noting "It tasted pretty good."

Yet Gina Gee, the second student threatened during the incident, was "really upset."

Teacher Raser was not amused. "If I had a deadly weapon, I would use it in my defense. It is embarrassing. It is degrading. This just should not go on in a university. It is past a joke."

Hawks Host CAA Championships

Way Out In (W)right Field

Chris Wright
Sports Editor

Looking Ahead...

For the second time in as many opportunities, UNCW embarrassingly lost a home rematch to teams they had previously defeated on the road.

The former loss against Tennessee Tech bordered upon insane, due primarily to the fact that the Hawks enjoyed double digit leads throughout most of the contest before plummeting.

Their most recent setback, however, incurred Saturday night against a rather hapless William and Mary squad they had earlier defeated by a school-record 39 points, was a real gem. As in cubic zirconium.

The apathy and lack of intensity displayed during that contest prompted senior Greg Bender to say "I can't stand to be part of a team that doesn't want to win and tonight they (William and Mary) wanted to win worse than we did."

The players (again) cited the upcoming encounter with Richmond as the underlying premise behind their inept performance. Coach Robert McPherson agreed, saying that it was "only human nature" to overlook the Indians with the Richmond game pending.

"Give William and Mary credit" was a favorite battery passed on from players and coaches alike. I give them a whole lot of credit. Afterall, they somehow managed to board their bus, leaving no one behind, probably stopped a few times along the way for food, and made it all the way down here without getting lost! Other than finding the gym, I see no need to give them credit. They scored roughly the same amount of points in this game as they did in Williamsburg. They had no more business beating us than, say, Tennessee Tech.

The simple fact remains that we played horribly, pure and simple.

Antonio Howard, easily one of the two best guards in the conference, scalped the Tribe for a whopping seven points, an output equaled by his turnovers. He scored 17 in the first encounter. He's simply too good to allow a lesser foe such as William and Mary to effectively shut him down. He said he lacked the intensity.

One way to rekindle the fire in some of these guys who obviously are enjoying the luxury of job security is to shake up the line-up.

McPherson, when pressed, said he did. "You saw tonight we ran guys in and out all night."

I must have been watching a different game. I saw three subs, who do play but don't regularly start, get about two minutes apiece.

It makes logical sense to me that since the regulars were already looking ahead to Richmond, why not go ahead and sit them down to fully insure that they will be well rested, mentally and physically.

Let guys like Major Wiggins, Robbie Carter-the best pure offensive rebounder in the league- and Bender get their thirty minutes. What they may lack in talent and athleticism they more than make up with heart. We might still lose, but it won't stem from a lack of intensity or will.

Incidentally, this "looking ahead" phenomenon is spreading to more than just the players and coaches.

Oh, yeah. I'm already looking ahead to the Mason game on Saturday because if we play the way we did against the Indians, I don't want to be anywhere near Trask when the Spiders entangle the Hawks in their undefeated web.

The Rockets had the best offense in the league, but were hampered by too many turnovers.

Count down to the CAA Swimming Championships are over today as the trials for the finals of the swimming competition have already begun. While you were catching some extra Z's or attending class this morning, the Seahawk swimmers took to the water at 11:00 am with high hopes of upending the defending champion, the Naval Academy, from the swimming crown. The Championships last from early Thursday morning until late Saturday night, so there's ample opportunity to go root for your favorite Hawks' swimmers in the Seahawk Natatorium.

The Hawks will be hosting the teams of American, James Madison, East Carolina, Navy, William and Mary, and Richmond. Trials start at 11:00 am every morning and finals are held nightly at 7:00 pm except for Saturday night where the finals start at 6:00 p.m.

This is the second time that the Championships have been held at the Seahawk Natatorium. The last time was in 1986 when the CAA conference was just a new organization. The Hawks finished third that year and over the past two years slithered farther back in the race for the swimming crown. Coach Dave Allen and a determined Seahawks team seemed totally committed on improving from last year 6th place showing.

"This is going to be the fastest meet of the year. We are going to have to take one event at a time. We must qualify first to have a shot in the finals," said Coach Allen. The Seahawk swimmers worked hard last week with sprint training and weight lifting. The workouts became lighter and shorter on the following Monday as the championships grew closer. The swimmers were in the final stages of preparation. They worked on perfecting their relay touches on the starting block and fine tuning their stroke techniques with the help of a video camera.

"This is the hardest I've ever work in swimming. Our last win (Over UNC-C) really boosted our moral," exclaim freshman swimmer Laurie Grant. Coach Allen has prepared his troops for the hoopla of the championships by calling frequent team meeting to remind his group that qualifying is the first priority. He rested the team this week because he doesn't want them too worn out to compete competitively with this stiff competition. "We want to attain that level of competition we had against UNC-Charlotte and then go beyond it," said Allen.

They'll need to be strong because the likes of two-time winner of the 500 and 1,650 yard freestyle, Senior Richmond George Edelman, and two-time Athlete-of-the-Year Debbie Williams of the Naval

"There will be fast swimming for sure," said Glenn Boze. There is no doubting that. Last year alone their were 25 meet records that were smashed. The men were 14 of 18 in establishing new records while the ladies obliterated 11 of 20 marks. Many of the swimmers expressed some bit of nervousness to the big event but claim they were mental ready to take on the challenge of meeting some of the South Academy. The diving competition will feature the top-notch abilities of ECU Sherry Campbell.

"It's been a long hard season for us but their is a flame in everybody's eye for this meet," said an enthusiastic Stephen Getzemann.

"You just have to be consistant in every aspects of your events," said Diver Jeff Cairnes. The diving competition should be a interesting tough competition. When UNCW took on ECU at Greenville, our Mary Beth Mills and their Sherry Campbell split the top spot on the diving boards. Mills claimed the 1 meter crown but Campbell was the best at the 3 meter level. This meet will be an interesting rematch of the top divers right now in the CAA. The will be pressure on the two leaders from both the Navy and JMU divers. It certainly won't be a confrontation that you would want to miss.

Both East Carolina and the Naval Academy are the favorites going in to the championships but anything can happen and placing and rank can change in a millisecond of time. These Championships should showcase some of the top prospects of the country. Here is an general itinerary for the swimming events: The freestyle races and relays will be held on Thursday, the backstroke and breastroke on Friday, and the butterfly and distance free races. The diving competition will go on every day with the men and women alternating from the 1 meter to the 3 meter board. So don't be a wet blanket, go down to the natatorium and see the speed demons in the waterways. That's right Hawksters, the Championships are finally here!

Heading into Saturday night's encounter against UNCW, William and Mary head coach Chuck Swenson realized two things- the winning team would be wearing green and gold and that in order to avoid another thrashing his team would have to play with more pride.

Curtis Pride, wearing the darker green and gold for only the fifth time all year, led the Indians in the rematch past UNCW 62-58, not so much with his point production as his leadership.

The 6'0" junior part time point guard and part time New York Yankee, missed the first game in Williamsburg with a knee injury, allowing the Seahawks to press at will.

This time, however, whenever they pressed, Pride simply broke it, affording the Indians to set up their half-court offense and slow the tempo.

"Curtis Pride was the difference," Swenson said. "He's just a tremendous athlete. Wilmington was set up to press, and as we saw last time, that set up so many of their points. Just by having him in the game steadied our team and tired their guards. He's only had two practices since December 6, but he is mentally tough. He was our key."

Tom Bock, the beneficiary of most of Pride's passes, scored a team high 17 points while Greg Burzell benefitted from a perfect shooting night (5-5, 3-3) to add 13. Scott Smith chipped in 10 points for the 4-16 Indians, who curiously looked forward to playing UNCW.

"I told the kids on the bus coming down that this was the best possible time to play UNCW," Swenson said. "There was no way they could be pumped up against us with Richmond coming in."

The Indians controlled the tempo from the outset of the second half, and tied the score early on a free throw from Pride.

Following a Greg Bender jumper from the left side which put UNCW ahead for the last time, 33-32 with over sixteen minutes left, William and Mary ran off four unanswered points to take a three point lead.

UNCW, or more specifically, senior Larry Houzer, matched the Tribe basket for basket over the next fourteen minutes, cutting the lead to 58-56 on Houzer's last basket of the game with :49 remaining.

Houzer scored 16 of the Hawks final 24 points. He finished with 22 on the night, going a perfect 8-8 from the field.

"We didn't get the ball inside often enough to Larry," McPherson said. "He didn't miss a shot all night. They did a good job of blocking the passing lanes. You have to give them alot of credit."

Pride then connected on both ends of a one-and-one to give the Indians a 60-56 advantage with :36 remaining.

Freshman Joe Cherry then hit two free throws to narrow the deficit to two again. After Pride missed the front end UNCW rebounded and called time out with :23 to set up the last play.

Cherry inbounded to Bender who looked down low to Houzer with less than ten seconds remaining, but his pass sailed out of Houzer's reach and out of bounds.

"I didn't stretch out and go get the ball," said Houzer. "They did a good job of putting a body on me. When we lose, I have to take some of the blame."

The Hawks lost earlier in the month in a similar circumstance to Tennessee Tech, a team which they had also previously beaten.

"You would have thought we would have learned something from the Tech game, but we just did the same things," said Bender. "This is one of my most frustrating losses at UNCW. They came in wanting to win very badly and we didn't."

Houzer was the lone Seahawk in double figures, scoring 22 points.

Yes, You heard right, the Seahawks won! They redeemed themselves from Saturday night's embarrassing loss to the hapless Tribe of William and Mary by knocking off previously CAA undefeated Richmond Spiders 68-64. The Spiders were 8-0 in the CAA and were riding a nine game winning streak when they ran into the roadblock of Houzer and Company.

"We had a lot to prove out there. We had to prove to the fans that we could still play good basketball," said Brannon Lancaster, who scored 11 points in the contest.

The Seahawks toyed with the Richmond Boys in the early going by seasawing back and forth with small leads. Around the 12:13 the Hawks staked a commanding 5 point spread they would up to nine before halftime. The Hawks used the outside shooting of Joe Cherry and Brian Lancaster to open up the inside game for Houzer's soft layups and short jumpers in the key.

"I wanted to come out offensively minded. I wanted to be there for the team," said leading scorer Larry "The Snake" Houzer.

Coach Robert McPherson was very pleased with the Hawks success against the highly touted Spiders. "The kids played well at both ends of the court. Our perimeter shooters did a super job," stated Coach McPherson. Both teams shot well from the free throw line but were under 50% in the field goal department which led to a low first half tally along with 10 turnovers and 6 steals.

The Seahawks came out on fire and extending their lead over the spiders to 14 points on a Lancaster's trey and field goals by Cherry and Houzer. The Hawks imposed a tight full court press that forced several Richmond's turnovers and lead to fast scoring opportunities. They later dropped back into a zone when the Spiders started to break through the press.

"Unfortunately the Hawks found our short commings. They out maneuvered us; our guys couldn't response fast enough," said Richmond Coach Dick Tarrant. However this didn't stop the Spiders from clawing and scraping to come back. They narrow the Seahawk's lead to single digits several times and keep the score there following a layup by senior guard Benji Taylor.

The lead dwindled to a mere four point differential near the two minute mark before the almost flawless Seahawk's foul shooting took over the rest of the way. Despite Richmond uncanny accuracy in the three point shooting in the closing minute; the steady free throw shooting of Antonio Howard (5 of 7) and Larry Houzer (14-16) finally shut the door on the Spider's last thread of desperation.

"They had no weak shooters on the floor so we were forced to foul the closest guy with the ball," said Coach Tarrant.

The Seahawks were able to contain both the Spider's big men and cool off All CAA candidate junior guard Ken Atkinson, who had been very instrumental in numerous Richmond victories this year. Most important they bounced back quickly off a sickening loss to William and Mary and strongly reinstated their reputation as a high caliber ball club.

Tonight's win tightens the CAA race to a four team affair with Richmond holding a slim two game lead over UNCW, George Mason, and American. The Seahawks are on a one game winning streak and will try to extend it Saturday at George Mason. Yes, the Hawks really Won!

Track Team Opens Season

STAFF REPORTS

The Seahawk Track Club opened the 1989 indoor season in fine fashion at the Eastman Kodak Invitational in Johnson City, Tennessee this past weekend. "The Kodak meet is one of the biggest indoor track meets in the country and our team gained a lot of valuable race experience this weekend," added head track coach, Bill Cason. The Lady Seahawks were lead by Beth Holt and Missy Hall who both ran to new school records in their respective events.

Holt cruised to a new personal best of 18:53 in the 5,000 meter run while Hall recorded a quick 5:24 in the mile run.

School records were also established on the men's side as David Simmons ran 4:24 in the mile run and Shawn Brinton 15:44 in the 5K. Also competing for the Seahawks were senior Layne Fuller and sophomore Dan Scott in the mile run.

The Seahawk Track Club's next meet will be Wednesday, February 8th at the Tarheel Indoor Invitational in Chapel Hill which will be followed by the first home meet on the schedule, February 11th on the Harold Greene Track. The February 11th meet is open to anyone who would like to run and all interested UNCW students, faculty and staff are encouraged to come out and run or cheer for the track team in their first-ever home meet. The meet starts at 12:00 noon and track events from 400 meters through 5,000 meters will be contested. Contact coach Bill Cason at 395-3889 for further information.

The women's basketball team returned February 7 from a road trip victorious over William and Mary and disappointed with their loss against Richmond. After this weekend their CAA record is 3-5 and overall 11-7.

The Lady Seahawks scalped the Tribe winning 73-52 on Saturday, Feb. 4. Charlene Page dominated the action by being the top scorer, hitting a whopping 27 points and pulling down 10 rebounds. Repeatedly she has held the positions of top scorer and rebounder this season. Her success has been constant throughout. She holds yet another position as player of the week. Way to go Page!

Jennifer Bennett, who is also having a great season, came in second, scoring 11 points and rebounding 9 balls. It looked as if it might have been a tight game at half-time with a score of 36-31, yet the combined effort of every Lady Hawk induced a marginal victory in the end.

However, on Monday night, they met their match when they encountered the Spiders. Tressa Resse, a sophomore, held the position of top scorer, hitting 18 points including three treys. Resse has definitely improved this season creating a vast amount of playing time for herself. Page was right behind Resse with 17 points and was the top rebounder. Kelly Kincaid pulled down 8.

The women's team will play Baptist tonight on their turf. When they last met on January 11 the Lady Seahawks beat them here 82-72. May they duplicate another win. On Saturday, February 11 the Lady Seahawks will confront George Mason in Trask Coliseum at 7:00. Their last meeting with the Lady Patriots proved fatal, with the Hawks losing 71-67. Please come out and support the women's basketball team.

Faithful Donors Return to Bloodmobile

BY DORA JOHNSON
STAFF WRITER

A coupon for a free Chick-fil-A was to be given to about 75 students and faculty members who were expected to donate 50 units of blood on Feb. 15 Red Cross blood drive.

The measles scare that hit the UNCW campus two weeks ago caused the first scheduled Blood Drive to be canceled.

"We had a goal of collecting 175 units of blood," said Deb Elam, American Red Cross Blood services director. "Since 20% of our donated blood is from schools, we haven't been able to pick up those scheduled units yet," said Elam.

People between the ages of 17 and 75 were eligible to donate. "We get most of our donations from first time donors," said Elam.

Before the processing of a donor can be started, they must read pamphlets on AIDS, nutrition, and answer a questionnaire on their medical history.

"A few people have this idea that we use the same needle for each donor; that is not the case. Each person is handled individually, and after that needle is used it's thrown away. There is absolutely no way you can contract AIDS from donating blood," Elam said. AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) is a virus that is transmitted by having sex with an infected person, sharing needles or syringes with infected people who use heroin, cocaine, or other intravenous drugs, and or if the mother has been infected with the AIDS virus, babies can be born with the virus.

Most UNCW students didn't seem to worry about the threat of contracting AIDS.

"It's necessary," said Vicki Boone, a junior Parks and Recreation major. "If I needed blood, I would hope someone would give it for me."

"I have no concern about AIDS, through blood donation," commented Kelly Fisher, a junior General Sociology major.

"For the past 2 years, I've been a regular donor. I first came out with some friends, I had a problem with needles, and wanted to get over that fear. Now when I see the blood mobile, I just automatically go in and donate," she said.

Tom Hatch patiently waits for his blood to be collected in the Room 100 of the Union. The Bloodmobile was here yesterday. (PHOTO BY JENNIFER YOUNG)

Some students have personal reasons for becoming blood donors.

"I had a friend who was in a motorcycle accident, we had the same blood type, and he is alive today because of (someone's) donation," stated Chris Bucci, a junior Business Marketing major.

"It's an assurance that there will be blood around if I need it. A savings account," he said.

If any students are interested in donating and missed the blood drive they can call the American Red Cross at 762-2683 and set up an appointment.

"It will be your good deed for the day," said Tom Hatch a junior U.S. History major. "It's blood that's available for you. Fig newtons, Pepsi, and a free Chick-fil-A, who can pass it up, besides it makes you feel good about yourself."

Visitation Day Will Bring 1,800 Here

BY KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

On February 25, UNCW will be the gathering place for over 1,500 high school juniors and seniors for the annual Visitation Day.

Between 1,500 and 1,800 students will be "using this day as a means of deciding...Is UNCW the place where I want to go live for the next four years?" said Diane Zeeman, Director of Undergraduate Admissions.

"This will be the only time, for some of these students, that they've been on campus, particularly if they are from far away," said Zeeman.

The students and their parents will participate in a variety of activities which will start at 1:00 and last until 5:00.

Greetings by SGA President, Karla Alston; Diane Zeeman will begin the day, and will be followed by a performance from the UNCW Cheerleaders.

After, students and their parents will break into smaller groups, and be encouraged to attend a series of activities and information sessions lasting from 1:30 -5:00.

The visitors will be asked to select one of the following group sessions: Student Life, Parents' Forum, or Financial Aid.

While a portion of the guests are attending the above session, others will either be taking a tour of campus, led by Ray Cockrell and the UNCW Ambassadors; going to question and answer sessions led by Departmental Representatives and Student Organization Representatives; or visiting the "Open House" which will be held in the residential section of campus. Douglas Johnson, Associate Director of Admissions, and Anne Collins, Assistant Director of Admissions, will also be present to answer questions and provide general information concerning UNCW.

Throughout the day, students and their parents will have the opportunity to speak with UNCW students, faculty, and administrators. Each session is designed to provide information and help them decide if UNCW is the place where they wish to further their education.

Zeeman said that this is a very important day for many because, "for a lot of students and parents this is the first child going off to college, mom and dad may not have gone to college, so it's all a new experience."

When Karla Alston, President of the SGA, needed a break, she would often wander downstairs from her office in the University Union just to listen to students' complaints. She still practices this technique of getting in touch with her student body; a practice that remains consistent with her philosophy about her demanding position.

Listening is a key attribute that contributes significantly to the performance of my job, she says. She has "stay in touch with the student body" in order to be an effective leader of the Student Government Association, she infers.

"If I'm not too busy, then students can even come in and just talk [about any problems they might have]," says Alston. "I listen to their suggestions and, more often than not, I can refer them to someone who can help them if I can't."

Alston explains that since her inauguration in April of 1988, her job has been demanding, yet worthwhile. "We had to work over the summer [of 1988] as well as the Fall and Spring" she says. "My first duty was to present an executive budget," states Alston.

The executive budget is approximately a $40,000 portion of the $235,000 in total student fees. This budget is used in order to accomplish her goals for the university.

"My platform had about four major goals that I wanted accomplished," says Alston, "all of which have been completed since my inauguration." The first goal on her list for university improvements included a "greater awareness" of the SGA and all that it entails.

This "greater awareness" has been executed in part by printing pamphlets explaining how to get involved in student government. Alston mentioned that this method of educating students only cost the SGA about $400.

Alston mentions another way of fostering this awareness; "By attaching signs to SGA appropriated products and services that read 'Compliments of the SGA', students are alerted to the fact that the SGA is a necessary tool for reform and improvement at UNCW.

Her second goal on her list was to make all financial records concerning the SGA public. "This was not the case in the past," says Alston. "With one sweeping decision, Alston has made all financial

Homecoming '89 Full of Fun

FROM UPR STAFF REPORTS

The Homecoming Steering Committee has been hard at work since December planning this year's Homecoming. Hopefully, this will be the best Homecoming ever. The week prior to the UNCW-Navy game was full of activities.

The week began with a 10 pm and 12 am showing of the Rocky Horror Picture Show. The film was very entertaining and those who showed this year received a Rocky Horror Party pack, consisting of rice and other paraphernalia necessary to the show.

"Rocky Horror was usually shown during Spring Week but it was decided that since it was always such a great event it would be used it to kick off Homecoming," said Johanna Harrington, Chairperson of the Homecoming Committee.

Among the other activities for the week was Victory, Defeat and Scribble, UNCW's version of the game Win, Lose or Draw. The response to Victory, Defeat and Scribble has been positive but 3 more teams of 3 people each were needed to make the game work.

Also, the Homecoming Special Events Coordinator, Frances Castillo, would like to see more people sign up to participate in the 100 person Twister on Friday.

On Friday the banners that have been entered in the Banner Contest will be judged. Prizes will be awarded to the winning team or individuals in each of the week's events.

The Homecoming Semi-Formal this year will be a wonderful event as well and should end all of the Homecoming festivities on a high note. The semi-formal will be held at Park Inn International.

There will be a cash bar and a mocktail bar as well. "The semi-formal this year should be a fun event. The DJ Mark McKay, is excellent and the facilities are great.

for the semi-formal," said Laura Hudson, the Dance Coordinator. In response to the question of how people should dress Laura said, "It isn't necessary to go out and buy a tea-length or rent a tuxedo, a nice dress, tea-length or not, is fine and guys should wear dress pants, a tie and a jacket.

We don't want people to feel like they have to go out and buy something just to come to the dance. That is why we had a semi-formal rather than a formal. We just want people to have a good time." Tickets to the Homecoming Dance can be purchased at the Information Center.

Homecoming will be a success as long as the students participate in the activities. If you or your team is interested in participating in Victory, Defeat and Scribble, the Gong Show or Giant Twister stop by the Student Activities Office, Room 202-C in the Union and sign up, also don't forget to get your tickets to the semi-formal.

Honor Society Active

The UNCW Chapter of Phi Kappa Phi, the national honor society for distinguished students in all academic fields, has begun its evaluation of student records for consideration of election to the Society. The Society's By-Laws allow a student to be considered for membership with a 3.75 GPA for Juniors with 74 hours or more completed, a 3.68 GPA for Seniors with 89 to 105 hours, and a 3.60 for Seniors with more than 105 hours completed.

The National Honor Society of Phi Kappa Phi was founded in 1897 at the University of Maine. Men and women in all academic disciplines are eligible for membership, on the basis of scholarship, integrity, and character. The Society's motto is "Let the love of learning rule mankind". There are about 250 chapters of the Society, established at leading colleges and universities throughout the country.

The UNCW Chapter of the Society was established in 1980. The fact that a n institution has to prove its excellence before a chapter of Phi Kappa Phi can be chartered makes membership in this Society a valuable asset to the graduating student. The Society is convinced that recognizing persons of good character who have excelled in an academic area will stimulate others toward this achievement. The Chapter's officers for the current year are Dr. Larry Usilton, President; Dr. Lewis Nance, Secretary-Treasurer; and Dr. Charles West, Public Relations Officer.

Elections to the Society are made each semester, after analysis of the University's academic records to determine eligible outstanding students. Final decision is made by the student and faculty members of the UNCW Chapter. The formal initiation ceremony has been scheduled for Thursday, April 13 this year.

Entertainment Opportunities

Eight Or Nine Feet, whose guitar-driven original rock and soaring vocal harmonies have made them favorites with college audiences in central N.C., will make their Wilmington debut on Thursday, February 16, at Front Street News.

The Mad Monk presents Valence on March 30 featuring music from 10 p.m. - 1 a.m. It will be Ladies Night with $1.00 off regular cover for ladies.

From February 22-26 the UNCW Department of Creative Arts presents "Painting Churches" by Tina Howe in the SRO Theatre at Kenan Hall. Shows are Wednesday through Saturday at 8:00 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Admission is $4.00 and UNCW students are free with ID. For more information, call Creative Arts at 395-3415.

From February 22-26 the Opera House Theatre Company presents "Sweet Charity" at the Scottish Rite Temple located at 1415 South 17th Street. Shows are 8:00 p.m. nightly. For more information, call Opera House at 762-4234. For ticket information, call the Box Office at 763-3398 or 763-9328.

On February 27 the Thalian Hall Concert Series presents the Theatre Ballet of Canada at 8:00 p.m. at Kenan Auditorium on the UNCW campus. For ticket information call the Box Office at 763-3398 or 763-2398.

The Thalian Association Children's Theatre will present two old time melodramas, THE MINER'S DAUGHTER and THE PERILS OF PRISCILLA, February 24 thru 26 at Jacob's Run, 208 Market Street.

Performances on February 24 will be at 7 p.m.; at 3 and 7 p.m. on February 25; and at 3 p.m. on February 26. Admission will be $1.50 for children and $3.00 for adults. Group discounts are available for 10 or more people.

Tickets will be available at the door an hour before performances or may be reserved and obtained from the box office located at 118 Princess Street. The reservation telephone number is 763-3398.

We The Mediocre

By Kelly Holsten

On Tuesday, February 21, the band DINOSAUR, from Massachusetts, will be playing at The Brewery in Raleigh. I am telling you this in advance because you must go and witness the spectacle. Don't go just because Dinosaur is a great band in the grand tradition of 60's melodic noise-fest; no, you must attend for the experience of an evening locked into a Hell-Hole with 250 doomed psychotics screaming for eternal communion with 1000 watts of ELECTRIC GOD.

A night at the Brewery is not to be taken lightly, especially if it involves breaking no less than six North Carolina statutes designed to keep Man from degenerating into a four-legged BEAST. Because you WILL degenerate, it's just a question of when, how, and into what.

This is the price you MUST pay because The Brewery and Cat's Cradle, in Chapel Hill, are practically the only two places in North Carolina that consistently book good alternative bands from outside a 300 mile radius. And since I-40 has reduced the drive to a little over two hours, this is a viable alternative to spending another empty night in Wilmington committing public suicide in Django's or artistic treason at Front Street.

If you happen to be of the "Djangos ilk," then you will be very upset by the utter and complete lack of ambience at The Brewery or Cradle. There are no tables for the usual innocuous Bar Chatter that pervades the normal establishments where BAR-TTE couples are formed. Conversation must be limited to mono-syllable grunts within inches of the object's ear. This is for practical reasons since the music is usually only a couple of decibels below the PAIN threshold. This also serves the dual purpose of keeping the number of idiots who participate in Bar Chatter down to a minimum. Unfortunately, many of the STYLE SET do sneak in under the pretense of ACTUALLY wanting to hear the band. They usually stand with void expressions, while letting the music wash over them like a shroud of death. Moving about is considered taboo along with any show of excitement. Fortunately, there are usually a large number of bedrock crazies who provide the needed boost to give the band, and the experience, the right amount of demented input. On a night when things are Right, there's nothing that quite matches the total exhilaration of being in the presence of some of the ONLY creative music played by the TROUBLED in our society.

POST SCRIPT: After reading this article, I have come to the realization that I am the one who is troubled...If I continue to write articles that are this confused, lost, or disoriented, I should be beaten about the head and shoulders with any object deemed suitable (such as a polo mallet). Hopefully, I will have my senses gathered by next week, thus enabling me to write a semi-descent review of DINOSAUR.

Towns Prepare For Yearly Spring Onslaught

BY AMY HUDSON
CPS Staff Writer

(CPS) -- Spring break hasn't been what it used to be during the last three years. There have been terrible riots in Palm Springs and South Padre Island, a string of deaths in Daytona Beach and a rigid crackdown on public drinking in Fort Lauderdale.

Yet, though the size of the welcome mat varies, most of the traditional spring break getaway spots say they want students back. Sort of.

Fort Lauderdale, Fla., for example, which once reigned as the national magnet for those looking for sun, sex and fun during break, in 1987 passed a series of strict new laws to punish students who sleep on the beach, look drunk in public and are crammed too many to a hotel room.

Palm Springs, Calif. -- still smarting from a 1986 riot in which hundreds of revelers ran wild, vandalized property, threw rocks, ripped clothes off women and briefly took over the center of town -- met students last spring with a show of force, empowering police to ticket and arrest vacationers for public drunkenness and rowdy behavior on the spot instead of letting officers use their discretion to issue warnings.

The crackdowns have helped drive students elsewhere.

Only about 20,000 students are expected in Fort Lauderdale this spring, city recreation superintendent Steve Person says. In 1985, about 350,000 students descended on the resort, snarling traffic, littering beaches and outraging local residents.

Person added the city is making no special attempt to invite students this year, either.

Something like 10,000-15,000 revelers are expected in Palm Springs, city promotions director Pam LiCalisi said.

"Palm Spring is way out," complained Chris Schneer, a national sales representative for College Tours, the largest spring break operator for Mexico. "It's too strict, there are no crowds and way too many police officers."

The Florida resorts have become so rigid that "it's really slowed down, and you can't even do what you want," added Schneer, who of course gets paid to lure students to Mexico instead.

Nevertheless, some U.S. resorts still want students to come.

Some 230 miles up the Atlantic coast from Lauderdale, Daytona Beach gladly has tried to fill the void, spending about $40,000 on marketing gimmicks to draw students.

should show up, predicts Georgia Carter of the city's tourist bureau, each spending an average of $325 each week they stay.

Civic paydays like that normally help city officials tolerate a lot of the insulting public behaviors, vandalism, violence and even deaths that seem to arise whenever huge hordes of students descend on a town.

Although Daytona Beach has had its share of petty crime and major tragedy -- since 1984, seven people have died and 34 others have been injured in falls from hotel and motel balconies -- city officials are resolutely upbeat.

"Everybody's getting better" at behaving civilly, Carter maintains.

"Many citizens are curious to see what goes on," she adds. "Others just avoid it."

At South Padre Island off the Gulf coast of Texas, the hosts are more tolerant. "Most of us enjoy (the student invasion)," says Breeze-Carlyle of the island's tourist bureau, "although we do look forward to our survivors' party in April."

The beach town, which last spring endured a violent riot, has "been real careful and (we) have been able to learn from (other resorts') mistakes," Carlyle said.

Traffic jams remain the island's biggest spring break problem, though Carlyle said the inconvenience is minor in light of the boon 300,000 student visitors are to the local economy. To keep the students happy, five new nightclubs have opened.

Mexico also is openly inviting students.

Schneer estimates 40,000-50,000 students will visit Mazatlan, about 1,000 will go to Puerto Vallarta and that Cancun, the normally expensive east coast resort that is trying to recover from a 1988 hurricane by promoting itself as a spring break town for the first time will draw about 3,000 collegians.

Other vacation spot promoters are staging events to keep visitors lawfully entertained.

Many resort officials are organizing intramural sports tournaments, concerts and contests to shift the emphasis away from drinking during the five-week break period, which different schools start anywhere from late February through early April.

Under those circumstances, Lauderdale, for one, would still love to host students.

"If a student is looking for a nice place for vacation, with good restaurants, bars and stores, then Fort Lauderdale is a good choice," Person offered.

"We're continuing to encourage students to come to Palm Springs and have a good time," LiCalisi noted. "But we're also encouraging them to follow the rules."

Figuring some students may find that requirement too onerous, College Tour's Schneer points out Mexico is "a lot cheaper and the drinking age is only 18."

Students Not Taking Many Humanities

(CPS) -- After five years of trying to expose more students to the humanities, "many" students are still graduating with just the barest knowledge of the liberal arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities contended Jan. 30.

"One would have hoped that all the concern about curriculum would have resulted in more," said Lynn Cheney of the organization, which sponsored a survey of college graduation requirements nationwide.

Almost four out of every 10 colleges will let students graduate without ever taking a history course, Cheney reported.

Nearly 45 percent don't make students take English or American lit classes, Cheney said, while 62 percent don't require philosophy and 77 percent don't require foreign languages.

To graduate, today's student has to take only an average of 1.5 more hours of humanities courses than did students in 1983-84, an increase of 6.2 percent.

On the other hand, students are required to take a lot more math and science than they were five years ago, the NEH survey showed.

The student who in 1983 would have gotten by with two credit hours of math now has to take 2.5 hours, a 24 percent increase.

"There's been such emphasis and such effort in the past five years to try to restore form and substance to undergraduate requirements," Cheney said. "I don't mean to suggest colleges are not trying. What this survey shows is how hard it is."

Race Relation Problems Linger

(CPS) -- College leaders threw a series of books, letters and reports at the problem of campus race relations the last week of January.

The presidents of Wesleyan University in Connecticut and Middlebury College in Vermont sent extraordinary letters to their students and alumni, talking about how they would like to end racial tensions in academe.

And the American Council on Education (ACE), the Washington, D.C.-based group to which all college presidents around the country belong, published a handbook advising campuses how to deal with race problems at their schools more readily.

They need the help. "We still don't understand the extent of the problem," said Joan Weill of the National Institute Against Prejudice and Violence. The "problem," however, has not been hard to spot.

Anti-black student posters have shown up at Stanford, white students attacked a black classmate at the State University of New York at Brockport and other racial conflicts have arisen during the 1988-89 school year at Northern Illinois, Northwest Missouri State and Columbia universities and the universities of North Dakota, Wisconsin and Mississippi.

In recent years, conflicts have erupted at Tompkins-Corland Community College in New York, Rodgers State and Ramapo colleges, Penn State, Dartmouth and the universities of Massachusetts, Michigan, California-Berkeley and Maryland, to name a few.

At Wesleyan President William Chace put it in a lyrical January 16 letter to all his students, "Hate has surfaced, racial animosity has grown hot, anger and resentment have overwhelmed reason."

"Good" college and university communities in this country have experienced very bad, sick moments," Chace wrote.

College presidents often have been surprised by the crises, unsure of how to respond and reacting on the spur of the moment.

The ACE book, called "Minorities on Campus: A Handbook for Enhancing Diversity," is designed to suggest what presidents can do to prevent the conflicts from erupting in the first place.

"This is the first time we've put together a comprehensive approach. Our role is trying to set an agenda," said ACE President Robert Atwell.

"Many, many institutions around the country are addressing this problem. At the same time, others out there are looking for help."

It offers hints for making black students stuck on mostly white campuses feel more at home, installing more diverse hiring programs and generally helping minorities feel less "marginal, conspicuous and isolated from the mainstream of the institution."

For example, it warns presidents to "pay attention to symbols" like Confederate flags and fraternity "slave auctions" that may mean nothing to them personally, but are potent representations of pain, degradation and death to others.

At the same time, Wesleyan's Chace, moved by the movie "Mississippi Burning" and by the celebrations surrounding Martin Luther King's birthday, asked students for ideas for making "the racial atmosphere of this place called Wesleyan better." And Middlebury College President Olin Robinson released a list of priorities to "reflect a fundamental commitment to the long-range success of our minority students."

Alcohol Banned From State Colleges

(CPS) -- In what may be the most sweeping attempt to restrict student drinking in the United States, a Connecticut state legislator has introduced a bill which, if passed, would ban alcohol from state colleges.

State Rep. Edith Prague says her bill prohibiting the sale, distribution and consumption of booze on Connecticut's public campuses is warranted by the rise in alcohol abuse use among students.

"Alcohol abuse by the youth of today is a major problem that cannot be ignored," Prague said.

Numerous surveys from around the country confirm her view. The last week of January, for instance, the Association of Junior Leagues reported that "heavy" drinking is increasing among college women in particular.

Prague contends it's because college life revolves too much around drinking, while academics and self-enrichment have taken a back seat. "Learning to drink is not part of the curriculum."

Prague also argues that much of the crime committed on campuses is alcohol-related, and that school policies may encourage students to drink even though most are younger than 21, Connecticut's legal drinking age.

A University of Connecticut committee already has begun studying ways to decrease student drinking, and may prohibit it even if Prague's bill is not passed. Existing university policies allow students over the age of 21 to drink in their dorm rooms.

U. Conn officials started reviewing campus drinking policies last spring, when student celebrations of the school's National Invitational Tournament basketball victory were marred by several incidents of vandalism.

Students, however, dislike the prospect of further restrictions. "Legislating a dry campus is unnecessary," said U. Conn should comply with the state law, but shouldn't restrict the activities of adults.

"I think the kids that want to drink would still get their alcohol from off campus," added James Ampfacher, the editor-in-chief of the campus newspaper.

Connecticut of course, is not alone in its efforts to curb student drinking.

A few others are toying with the idea of total prohibition, too. At Michigan State University administrators last month conceded publicly they had considered an outright drinking ban, but opted instead to try to enforce existing policies more stringently.

"The emphasis here is not to dry up the campus, literally, but it's to reduce the use and misuse of alcohol," said MSU vice president for student affairs James Studer.

In Louisiana, the Hammond City council passed an anti-loitering ordinance last fall to discourage Southeastern Louisiana University students from hanging around outside after local bars and taverns close.

Also last fall, the universities of Pennsylvania and Washington, Indiana and Princeton universities and Cornell College in Iowa took steps to restrict campus drinking.

The Junior Leagues started a three-year alcohol awareness program aimed at college women called "Woman to Woman: The Campus Generation."

Alcohol contributes to many "life damaging" problems for college women, including date rape and drug abuse, said

Junior League spokeswoman Cary Curtis.

But while the trend appears to be moving towards limiting alcohol use on campuses, at least one school has loosened its drinking rules a little.

Officials at Washington's Linn-Benton Community College agreed in October to allow the limited use of alcohol on the previously dry campus.

Organizations wishing to serve alcohol. It's to be primarily used in a social atmosphere, with restrictive conditions. It should not be interpreted that there will be a student pub.

A Woman's Guide to Condoms

Why more women are choosing condoms-

For the first time ever, almost half of the condoms sold in America each year are purchased by women. Women have traditionally taken the responsibility for birth control, but their new interest in condoms is primarily the result of another concern: protection against sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Women are often more vulnerable than men to STDs and are more likely to suffer permanent physical damage from their effects.

How to choose condoms-

There are two types: latex rubber and the more expensive "natural skin" condom made from animal membrane. Latex is recommended over "natural skin" because the AIDS virus or other germs may be less likely to pass through it.

Condoms can help prevent disease-

Health officials recommend latex condoms as a barrier to help guard against many types of STDs including syphilis, gonorrhea, trichomoniasis, herpes, venereal warts, and AIDS.

Where to buy and store condoms-

Your local pharmacy is your best source. They are also available from the Health Department and the Student Health and Wellness Center. Keep condoms at room temperature and avoid warm or hot places like glove compartments- heat can destroy condoms over time. Condoms can be stored for about two years.

Use condoms correctly-

Open the package carefully to avoid tearing the condom with your fingernails. Don't ever unroll a condom before using it to check or test it- condoms are fully tested before they leave the manufacturer.

Unroll the condom over the erect penis, leaving a half an inch slack at the tip to hold the semen. Be sure to press the air out of the tip as you unroll the condom because an air bubble could cause the condom to break during intercourse.

Condoms must be applied before the penis comes into contact with any seminal fluid released prior to ejaculation.

The condom should be firmly held against the base of the penis during withdrawal to prevent leakage. And, of course, a condom should never be reused.

What to do if a condom breaks or leaks-

If leakage or breakage occurs during intercourse or withdrawal, immediately apply a spermicide into your vagina or consult your medical professional for further advice.

The importance of lubrication-

Insufficient lubrication can cause discomfort and irritation as well as possibly causing a condom to tear or rip. A water-based lubricant like KY Brand Lubricating Jelly can be applied by either partner. KY jelly is the vaginal lubricant doctors recommend most- it's convenient to use, has a natural consistency, and does not contain fragrances that may irritate sensitive vaginal tissues.

Never use petroleum jelly for vaginal lubrication-

Petroleum-based products actually weaken latex rubber and significantly increase the risk of breakage. Because it is not water soluble, petroleum jelly can be difficult to remove. Left on vaginal tissue, it can mask symptoms of vaginal infection and thus delay proper treatment.

UNCW Condom Survey Tallied

By Jeff Silverman

On February 6-7, 1989, students were asked to fill out short surveys concerning their knowledge and opinions of condom machines on the UNCW campus. Survey tables were set up in the cafeteria and University Union. A total of 262 students were surveyed.

The breakdown included resident students (104 males and 61 females); and non-resident students (55 males and 42 females). Six resident and one non-resident surveys were discarded due to being filled out improperly.

We were disappointed to find that only about 63% of UNCW students knew that FREE CONDOMS ARE AVAILABLE for all registered students, at the Student Health and Wellness Center, located in the Student Support Center. Hopefully the other 37% will read these results and learn the same.

The most important question on the survey was: "Do you think condom machines should be placed on campus in other [other than the Health and Wellness Center] locations?" 74% of the students surveyed reported feeling, very strongly, that these machines should be placed on campus. Another 21.5% agreed, either to a moderate (19%) or minimal (2.5%) extent; and only about 4.5% said that they didn't feel the machines should be placed on campus at all. Almost all of the resident students who felt strongly about having condom machines on campus felt strongly that those machines should be located in the residence halls.

Only 39% of those same (resident) students felt, strongly, that the University Union would be another good location for the machines 28% agreed, with them, to a moderate, and 26% to a minimal, extent. Of the commuter students surveyed, 68% were strongly in favor of putting these machines in the Union. Another 25% agreed, to a lesser extent. Some students also suggested placing condom vending machines in the bookstore, the cafeteria, the library, Trask coliseum, with all food and drink vending machines, and a few even went as far as to say "put them everywhere" (in all public restrooms).

Better Condom Communication Hints

* It's natural to feel uncomfortable. If you can say you're embarrassed or uncomfortable it may help both of you relax.

* Be flexible about when to bring up the subject but don't wait until sexual intimacy is moments away. Be ready to talk whenever the time seems right, even if it isn't when you'd planned.

* Be clear in your own mind about what you will and won't do sexually. If you're clear, it's easier to talk about safer sex.

* Give your partner time to think about what you've said. Myths and fears about AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases (STD's) are rampant--your partner may need some time to adjust.

* Keep your sense of humor. Yes! AIDS and other STD's are serious. But being able to laugh and joke may help you both feel more comfortable.

* Pay attention to your partner's response. If he/she seems to be having trouble with what you're saying, slow down. Wait awhile. If your partner resists safer sex, then maybe you need to think more carefully about the relationship. Is this someone you really want to have sex with?

* Watch out for situations that make it hard to talk about and practice safer sex. Be wary of romantic times when you don't have condoms and spermicide. Alcohol or other drugs make it impossible to make good decisions about safer sex.

The Facts On Condoms

*Second only to abstinence, correct and consistent use of condoms and spermicides is the most effective way to prevent the transmission of STD's, including HIV Infection (AIDS).

*Through 1988, the Center for Disease Control reports 84,985 actual cases of HIV Infection, and of those, 48,582 deaths.

*It is estimated that 1.5 million people are infected with the HIV virus, many of those unaware they are carriers.

*The bulk of new cases of genital warts, chlamydia, gonorrhea, and herpes occur in the 18-24 year population.

*Condoms are readily available and can be purchased by people of any age or gender without a prescription from a doctor.

*There are no known side effects from using condoms.

*Using condoms promotes honest and direct communication between sexual partners.

Purpose Of Condom Week

The purpose of National Condom Week is to increase the proportion of sexually active people who use condoms and spermicides correctly and consistently. The week is designed to decrease our "condom-mania" and become condom "literate".

*Sexually transmitted diseases (STD's) are infections you catch through sexual contact. There are many: genital warts, chlamydia, herpes, gonorrhea and AIDS are just a few.

*Even though they may not have symptoms, persons with HIV infection (AIDS), may transmit the virus to others through sexual contact or exposure to blood.

*AIDS and other STD's may be prevented by abstinence, correct and consistent use of condoms and spermicide, monogamous relationships, fewer sexual partners, avoidance of risky sexual practices, and not sharing needles.

DON'T HAVE SEX??????? THAT'S ONE WAY TO AVOID STD'S.

OR

Always use condoms and spermicides.
Reduce the number of sexual partners.
Know your partner's sexual history.

1987, Northern Illinois University

IMPORTANT INFORMATION ABOUT THE HIV ANTIBODY TEST

1. The test is NOT A TEST FOR AIDS, but a test for antibodies to the virus that can cause AIDS.
2. Talk to a counselor before deciding whether to be tested.
3. If you decide to be tested, do so ONLY at a center that provides both pre- and post-test counseling.
4. If possible, use an ANONYMOUS testing center.
5. Be sure that the testing center uses two ELISA tests and a WESTERN BLOT or IFA test to confirm a positive result.
6. A positive test result is NOT a diagnosis of AIDS and does not necessarily mean that you will develop AIDS.
7. A positive test result DOES mean that you can infect others and that you should avoid risky or unsafe activities.
8. It can take six months after infection to develop antibodies, so the test may not indicate whether you have been infected during that period.
9. A negative test result DOES NOT mean that you are immune to HIV or AIDS or that you cannot be infected in the future.
10. Whether your test results is positive or negative, you should practice only safer sex and avoid using intravenous drugs.

YOU CAN PROTECT YOURSELF FROM STDs

Having only one sexual partner is the best way to protect yourself from STDs. If you have more than one sexual partner, you need to do other things to protect yourself. Here are some things you can do to lower your chances of getting STDs.

• Be careful about your partner(s). Before you have sex, look closely at your partner's genitalia. Look for signs of STD- a rash, a sore, redness, or discharge. If you see anything you are worried about, don't have sex!

• Use a condom for all types of sexual behavior. If you are a woman, carry your own condoms.

• Use birth control foam, cream,

DO YOU KNOW THAT.....

*Sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) are extremely contagious.
*There are more than 20 different diseases that can be sexually transmitted.
*The risk of getting an STD is greater than ever- estimates are that 1 in 5 Americans get some form of STD each year.
*Some STD's can lead to serious medical complications-even death, infertility, and cervical cancer-if not properly treated.
*You can have an STD with no noticeable symptoms.
*The more sexual partners you have, the more likely you are to get an STD.
*You can spread an STD to other people and not know it.
HIV Infection and other STD's are preventable, with the correct and consistent use of latex condoms with spermicides.

or jelly. These chemicals kill most STD germs as well as sperm.

• Know the symptoms and signs of STDs. If you notice a symptom that worries you, get it checked out!

• Get checked for STDs every time you have a health exam. This is very important for women, who often have no signs of STD. If you have more than one partner, you need a regular STD checkup every 6 months.

• If you do have an STD, your partner(s) must get treated when you do.

• If you have an STD, don't have sex until your doctor says that you are cured.

When you get that loving touch, buy a condom; they don't cost much.

PLAY SAFE, 1986

FATAL ATTRACTION

Glenn Close was the star of this big box-office hit of 1987 and her attraction to Michael Douglas was almost fatal. However, in real life, sexual attraction can be just as fatal if it involves risky sexual behaviors. In order to prevent HIV Infection and other sexually transmitted diseases

- *practice abstinence (the surest protection)
- *share love and tenderness but not body fluids
- *discuss each other's sexual history
- *always use a condom and spermicide.

Looking At Your Own Risks

This questionnaire is meant for you to answer privately, to help you assess your risk of having been exposed to HIV. It can neither diagnose AIDS nor tell you whether you have contracted HIV. Its purpose is to make you aware of the potential risks of your overall behavior.

While this questionnaire is meant for women, you might well want to share it with your partner so that he, too, can look more closely at his possible risks. (If it is used by a man, a question about bisexuality must be added: Has he had unprotected intercourse with another man in the past five years? A "yes" answer adds 20 points to the score.)

Each answer has a point value, shown at the left in parentheses. Remember, a high total score does not mean you have contracted HIV -nor does a low score guarantee you haven't. You should ask a doctor a health counselor about any specific worries you may have after assessing your risk.

1. In the past ten years I have had
  - (1) _____ one sex partner
  - (2) _____ 2-4 partners
  - (3) _____ 5-9 partners
  - (6) _____ 10 or more partners
2. Most of my sexual contacts during the past three years were in (check up to two answers that most apply to you):
  - (1) _____ a steady relationship or marriage that I believe is monogamous
  - (2) _____ a relationship in which I have been monogamous but my partner may not have been
  - (5) _____ multiple relationships with partners pretty well known to me
  - (10) _____ multiple relationships with partners I don't know well
3. My sexual activities during the past three years include (check all that apply to you):
  - (4) _____ unprotected ( no condom ) vaginal or anal intercourse with a partner whose AIDS risks I have not discussed
  - (3) _____ vaginal or anal intercourse using condoms
  - (2) _____ unprotected vaginal or anal intercourse in a long-term monogamous relationship

KEY:

- 32 or more: High risk. You should talk to a counselor to learn more about your risk behaviors and consider getting an HIV test.
25 to 31: Medium risk. You should consider counseling and getting an HIV test.
21 to 24: Moderate risk. You should consider any changes that could lower your risk even further.
20 or less: Low risk. You should continue to monitor your risks carefully and make sure your partner understands the AIDS risk behaviors.

SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF "HEALTHY" RELATIONSHIPS

Each person feels whole without the other.

"I am whole. You are your own person. We enjoy being together. We work well together."

There is a balance between time to be alone and time to be together.

"My world is full, and you are an important part of it. The time we spend apart enhances our time together. I want to be with you because I choose to do so."

Each person feels responsible for her or her own self esteem.

"I am worthwhile and a person of value. What I think, believe and feel are important. I feel good about my choices."

Relationships with other people are encouraged, non-threatening, and appreciated.

"I am enriched by my other friendships. Many of my needs are met by getting to know and spend time with other people, both male female. We trust each other to respect these times with others."

There are ongoing opportunities for support and growth--individually and together. There is a willingness to recognize when the relationship is changing.

"Our growth enriches our relationship. We both value growth and change. It seems that our growth is leading us in different directions."

Each partner is able to accept the other for who they are and does not try to change or "mold" them into something different.

"I don't always like what you do, and I will try and let you know when I am uncomfortable with a situation. We need to be able to communicate with one another when problems come up."

Both people are willing to learn ways to negotiate and collaborate when things are not going smoothly. Each are able to "fight fairly".

"I do not like it when you.....It makes me uncomfortable, or angry when you.....I appreciate it when you tell me what is bothering you."

SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF "UNHEALTHY" RELATIONSHIPS

One or both partners feel incomplete without the other.

"With you I am complete. You are my other half. At last I have found you. What would I do without you? I need to be with you always."

All of my tomorrows depend on your love."

The level of togetherness and separateness are out of balance.

"We must do everything together. My world revolves around you. I am miserable and lonely without you being near me all the time."

One or both partners rely on the other for their self esteem.

"I need you to think I am perfect for you. I am nothing without you. Do you really love me?" I can't do it without you to help me."

There is an inability or unwillingness to establish and appreciate relationships with other people.

"I'd rather you not go, and stay here with me. I only want to be with you. We give each other everything we need."

The fantasy exists that everything in the relationship will always be the same.

"Let's stay the same. I never want us to change. We'll always be perfect for each other."

The false expectation that one partner can change the other to meet his or her needs now or in the future.

He will change if I just love him enough. I'll just try harder. Maybe

One or both partners show a lack of interest or unwillingness to negotiate problems or learn to "fight fairly".

"I don't want to talk about it. You always act this way. We'll talk about it later. You always bring this up, over and over."

How To Have A Fair Fight

1. Be specific when you introduce a gripe.
2. Don't just complain, no matter how specifically. Ask for a reasonable change that will relieve the gripe.
3. Ask for and give feedback of the major points- to make sure you are heard, to assure your partner that you understand what he or she wants.
4. Confine yourself to one issue at a time. Otherwise, without professional guidance, you may skip back and forth, evading the hard issues.
5. Do not be glib or intolerant. Be open to your own feelings, and equally open to your partner's.
6. Always consider compromise. Remember your partner's view of reality may be just as real as yours, even though you may differ. There are no totally objective realities.
7. Do not allow counter-demands to enter the picture until the original demands are clearly understood, and there has been a clear-cut response to them.
8. Never assume that you know what your partner is thinking until you have checked out the assumption in plain language; nor assume or predict how your partner will react or what he or she will accept or reject. Crystal-gazing is not for pairing.
9. Don't mind-rape. Ask. Do not correct your partner's statement of his or her own feelings. Do not tell a partner what he or she should know or do or feel.
10. Never put labels on your partner. Call your partner neither a coward, nor a neurotic, nor a child.

If you really believe that your partner is incompetent or suffers from some hopeless basic flaw, you probably would not be with him or her. Do not make sweeping, labelling judgments about his or her feelings, especially about whether or not they are real or important.

11. Sarcasm is dirty fighting.
12. Forget the past and stay with the here and now. What either of you did last year is not as important as what you are doing and feeling now. And the changes you ask cannot possibly be retroactive. Hurts, grievances, and irritations should be brought up at the earliest possible moment, or the person has the right to suspect that they may have been saved carefully as weapons.
13. Do not overload your partner with grievances.

To do so makes him or her feel hopeless and suggests that you have either been hoarding complaints or have not thought through what really troubles you.

14. Meditate. Take time to consult your real thoughts and feelings before speaking. Your surface reactions may mask something deeper and more important. Don't be afraid to close your eyes and think.
15. Remember that there is never a single winner in an honest intimate fight. Both either win more intimacy, or lose it.

Differences Between Giving/Receiving Blood

1. Giving blood. You are not now, nor have you ever been in danger of getting AIDS from giving blood at a blood bank. The needles that are used for blood donations are brand-new. Once they are used, they are destroyed. There is no way you can come into contact with the AIDS virus by donating blood.

2. Receiving blood. The risk of getting AIDS from a blood transfusion has been greatly reduced. In the interest of making the blood supply as safe as possible, donors are screened for risk factors and donated blood is tested for the AIDS antibody. Call your local blood bank if you have any questions.

HOW TO EVALUATE YOUR RELATIONSHIP

There aren't any right or wrong answers to the following questions, but the way you respond can tell you a lot about the most intimate relationship in your life:

- *How much time do you spend laughing together?
- *Do you spend free time with friends or in groups to avoid being alone together?
- *How do you feel when the two of you have a "free" Saturday night with no plans? Do you try to think of things to fill the time?
- *Do you share more of your feelings with friends than with your partner?
- *When you think of how your partner will respond to an experience or remark, do you anticipate a negative or positive reaction?
- *Do you talk about each other's needs and how they can be satisfied more fully?
- *Do you give each other compliments?
- *Are you best friends?
- *How do you feel about your communication or your sexual relationship? Do you think your partner is satisfied or dissatisfied?

Is There A Cure For AIDS?

There is presently no cure for AIDS.

Medicines such as AZT have prolonged the lives of some people with AIDS. There is hope that additional treatments will be found.

There is also no vaccine to prevent uninfected people from getting the infection. Researchers believe it may take years for an effective, safe vaccine to be found.

The most effective way to prevent AIDS is avoiding exposure to the virus, which you can control by your own behavior.

I'M LOOKIN' FOR A NEW LOVE"

If you're really looking for a new love, please consider all the sexually transmitted diseases that aren't so new. Diseases like genital warts, chlamydia, herpes, gonorrhea and HIV Infection (AIDS). Unless you talk openly and honestly with your "new love", how sure can you be that their love is not so new? Know your partner's sexual history!!

What Price Is Human Dignity?

DELTHEA SIMMONS
PRESIDENT, BLACK STUDENT UNION

I was in the HAWK'S NEST the other day and found myself engaged in a rather interesting conversation with a fellow student here at the university. The subject was South Africa.

We talked about the injustices there centering on detainment without cause or charge, work passes to enter the cities and white neighborhoods, separations of families, torture, murder, etc.

Toward the middle of our little chat I was compelled to ask him what I considered to be a fairly simple question. "What price is human dignity?" I asked. He never answered.

He just proceeded to tell me that things weren't really that bad there, (for he had been there and I had not) and that we here in the United States would do better to get our own house in order and leave the affairs of other countries to their own devices.

I've thought quite a bit about that conversation in the days since then, and I even saw the logic behind his arguments. It is true that the country of South Africa is a prime supplier of several very important and hard to come by materials and gems on which the U.S. is dependent.

It is also true that should the present regime fall, the African National Congress with its pro-Communist leaning will most likely come to power. But when you consider the fact that the fall of this regime is not a question of "if it fails", but merely of when, you soon come to grasp one simple fact. Sooner or later the government of the United States is going to have to deal with the black peoples of South Africa.

Black Africans, are going to remember who took a stand in their behalf, something of a sorting of the goats and the sheep. When that day finally arrives the United States, if it continues its present policies, will find itself standing before a very angry God with a less than sterling record to defend.

This is my political argument for American divestment of funds in South Africa. But, should you find yourself struggling with the question of whether or not the United States should divest all funds in South Africa, don't base your opinions on politics. Ask yourself one simple question, "What price is human dignity?"

View From The Right

S. Africa Vital Strategically

Wendell L. Jones
Vice-President, UNCW College Democrats

Since the early 1960's, there has been a raging debate amongst policy makers in the U.S. as to what to do about the South Africa question. More specifically, the question has been one of whether or not to impose the economic sanctions. While most agree that such sanctions would in fact work towards bringing down apartheid, the Sanctionists have failed to answer the question: What do we do when we are no longer welcome in Southern Africa? That is, after all, the ultimate result.

South Africa is of vital strategic interest to the West in general, but for our purposes, the United States specifically. The vast majority of the strategic minerals used by the West are either imported or price dependent on South Africa.

Further, roughly 60% of western shipping must pass the African cape on its way to and from the oil fields of the Middle East. Due to rough winds and seas to the south, these ships must hug tightly to the coast; easy targets for a belligerent state. With the Suez Canal operational, there has been a decrease in traffic, however, the Suez could be closed at any time. Loss of both routes could severely damage U.S. power worldwide.

If we impose the sanctions, two fallings will occur. The black population suffers. That much is definable. In an independent public opinion poll conducted five years ago, black factory workers in South Africa opposed U.S. sanctions by 75%. The sanctions would then do us a "double disservice" as former Secretary of State Shultz said, by "enabling proponents of apartheid to blame South Africa's disastrous economy on us while, at the same time, drastically reducing our presence." Secondly then, we would alienate the current government and destroy hope of achieving ties with a black government should it come to power.

We should maintain the current policy of "constructive engagement," designed by Chester Crocker in order to achieve an end to apartheid. We must however, do so with two modifications. We must reinstate dialogue with the black leaders, including the African National Congress. Only then can we come to a full understanding of their needs and be in a position to quickly solidify interest should war occur. Further our leaders must simply shut-up. Public declarations can serve no positive end as the government in Pretoria will not risk its public support at home by the appearance of backing down to the U.S. A solution to apartheid can be found in diplomatic circles, not in trade policy.

A South African ambassador to the U.S. said three years ago in the face of such sanctions, "South Africa is bent on reform. South Africa wants reform for its own sake. But if anybody, anybody comes and says to us that 'if you don't do this then we do that,' our answer is: 'We didn't hear you.'" America's vital interest can ill afford to go unheard by Pretoria, regardless of color.

Finally, there is the problem of American credibility. During the time we have so diligently criticized Pretoria, we have supported with the same zest, the Shah of Iran, Ferdinand Marcos and "Papa Doc" Duvalier. Also, until the most recent State Department review of human rights, we have all but ignored the exact same racist oppression going on in Israel. Even now, the criticism of the Israeli Defense Force's use of weapons against civilians was soft and lacking in ultimatums. In order for any measures toward Pretoria to achieve effectiveness. The administration must begin to apply the "duck test;" if it walks like racial oppression, quacks like racial oppression, then by all means let us call it racial oppression.

Student Designs BARE BUTTS

Dear Editor,
Brainstorming is a concept I developed in college. I was engaged in this activity after reading The Seahawk newspaper (2/9). An editorial by Chad Adams stated that we hadn't gone far enough with our anti-smoking campaign and that more attention was needed to address the problem.

This gave me the idea for my new product, the smokeless cigarette. This cigarette would look like the real thing but instead of having tobacco, it would have an extra long charcoal filter, there would be a scent compartment to flavor the inhaled air with menthol, mint and cherry blossom fragrances.

Think about it, a healthy cigarette made of completely biodegradable materials and nonoffensive to even the most sensitive of people. When used around tobacco smokers or other sources of noxious fumes, it would filter the air so that all you got would be fresh breath! In addition, I could inject some air diffusable vitamins to boost the immune system and increase the performance capabilities of the user.

Good advertising for such an item is a must. The product should have a name that would cause excitement, yet be easy to remember. Giving the matter thought and contemplating for a while, I decided on BARE BUTTS for my innovative product. After all, who doesn't enjoy a Bare Butt once in a while? BARE BUTTS is an acronym that stands for: Breathe air reducing Environmentally Bad Unhealthy Toxic Tobacco Smoke.

This name gives variety to the choice of advertising slogans. Such as "BARE BUTTS will put a smile on your cheeks" and "You don't have to hide your BARE BUTTS inside, you can enjoy them in public." "Having BARE BUTTS is as refreshing as being naked in the Great Outdoors." Keeping with the trend of using sex in advertising, I could use a poster girl saying "If I can't have BARE BUTTS, then I want nothing at all!" the possibilities are end-less.

Selling these cigarettes would be easy. Licenses aren't required, they could come with endorsements from the Surgeon General and the EPA.

An age restriction wouldn't be necessary as they would be safe for all but the youngest of children. The price would be considerably lower as the buyers wouldn't be making the tobacco barons rich.

Health insurance premiums would be less because these cigarettes would make you live longer not shorter. One warning though, anything can become a habit, and so can fully inhaling a clean breath of air. Once addicted, it could be a habit harder to break than smoking.

I'm applying for a patent and while it is pending, I am gearing up to produce BARE BUTTS in Wilmington. I have also decided to try different flavors and colors. As with any new product, it needs to have a test market. UNCW seems to be the perfect place to test BARE BUTTS of different colors all over campus.

Tax Changes Don't Mean Hikes

During his election campaign, George Bush promised no new taxes or rate increases. He also said he wanted to lower capital gains taxes.

Despite this, nearly everyone in Washington has joined a loud chorus insisting that taxes must be raised. Washington needs the money, they say.

What most people don't realize is that Mr. Bush can cut tax rates just like Ronald Reagan did, but without reducing revenues.

No fancy supply-side claims, just simple arithmetic.

It is hardly a secret that anyone with enough money and skill can avoid taxes year after year. People working at the minimum wage still pay more money in taxes than many millionaires and billion-dollar corporations. Our new leader could be the one to change that.

If President Bush wants to reduce taxes on capital gains, why should he stop there? Why not simply reduce all taxes on personal income?

Wouldn't it be nice if we could have a system that makes collections simpler, fairer, and better for everyone?

That was the promise of the 1986 tax reform. The act did reduce the number of tax brackets, but the rules and the number of forms increased. No one would call this a simple system.

It isn't particularly fair, either. Wealthy people and large companies still avoid taxes. Tax cheating still goes on.

Nevertheless, it was a step in the right direction.

Now, let's take the next step. Let's revise the law to provide for a flat 10 percent tax on all income, with every adult's first $10,000 in income free from tax.

Such changes can't easily be made overnight, so let's reduce rates over a five-year period—to 18 percent the first year, then 16, 14, 12, and finally to 10 percent.

Those who prefer the special privileges and credits of the current system (or who have lower rates due to exemptions) may continue to use it, provided that they pay tax of at least 10 percent of their total income each year.

You may be surprised to learn that this flat tax will actually eliminate the deficit—provided that expenditures are not increased markedly over the next four years.

The reason is simple. America's corporate taxes are not based on what you do and I would call income. A corporation is allowed to deduct its expenses and pay taxes only on the few dollars left over at the end of the year.

If we had the same deal—and many corporate executives do—we could pay all our bills, take vacations, and join a country club—and the more we spent the lower our taxes would be. If we had no money left at the end of the year—no problem. We would have no tax bill at all!

This tax system has made our large companies wonderfully generous employers, but not the

Labels, Envelopes Speed Refunds

Many delays in the processing of federal income tax returns could be avoided if taxpayers used the labels and envelopes that accompany their tax packages, the Internal Revenue Service says.

The peel-off label, which contains the taxpayer's name, address and social security number, is designed to expedite processing at Internal Revenue Service centers and speed up the issuance of a refund check.

The IRS advises taxpayers to use the label, even if corrections are necessary. For example, in the case of a change of address, the correction should be made directly on the label.

One of the most common and troublesome errors that can be avoided by use of the label is the listing of an incorrect or illegible social security number. Questionable social security numbers are a major cause of delayed refund checks.

The coded, pre-addressed envelope ensures that the return is sent to the proper Internal Revenue Service center. Once the envelope reaches the service center, the coding speeds entry into the processing system.

Use of the peel-off label and coded envelope gets a return into the system with as little manual processing as possible, and the faster a return gets into the system, the faster a refund can be issued.

Tax Tips

Here are some pointers to help get your refund sooner.

- Use the peel-off label and pre-addressed return envelope.
- Double-check your math.
- Use the correct tax table.
- Sign and date your return.

Working Students

When you fill out your Form W-4, "Employee's Withholding Allowance Certificate," remember: If you can be claimed on your parent's return, you generally cannot be exempt from income tax withholding. To get it right, read the instructions that come with your Form W-4.

Should UNCW Comply With City

THE SEAHAWK

FEBRUARY 16, 1989 • PAGE 10

BY GREG GERRANS
STAFF WRITER

When something grows, inevitably there will be growing pains. Expansion is usually good. UNCW is in an ideal growing environment.

We are at a prime and crucial stage in our development. There are serious questions about the University Administrations environmental awareness that need to be answered.

Fortunately there are those who realize the incentives of planned growth. Wilmington is growing at a constant rate. The town has enacted ordinances to protect the environment. In areas under construction, 8% of the project must be landscaped.

Joan Willey, who enforces the municipal codes, stated that the entire city (except UNCW) complies with the ordinance.

"Our primary goal is to break up the seas of asphalt we're finding in new construction," says Ms. Willey. "They tend to look bleak contribute to erosion, and raise surrounding temperatures." Developers have to break up the construction project with patches of trees and grass.

There are several reasons for this. Using trees and plants, as opposed to concrete & steel, enhances the appearance of the community. It appeals more psychologically to have areas of nature rather than unbridled construction.

The primary reason of the zoning ordinance is the effect that it can have upon the environment. The 8% of foliage can give shade which will cool, causing less energy consumption. This in turn will help the global warming problem. The less energy we use the less it will cost, which is an economic benefit.

In addition to cutting cost the plants can produce oxygen and absorb carbon dioxide. Carbon dioxide is the gas that is responsible for global warming. The National Forestry Service says that by planting greenery we can combat the green house effect.

UNCW's location lends to the environmental problems we're facing. The runoff from all of the parking lot's on UNCW are emptied into Bradley Creek. The creek is adjacent to the campus. This in turn empties into the inland water way. Any oil, petroleum, and trash washed into the gutters eventually finds its way into the waterway.

"UNCW is changing the fragile balance of the local waters," says Dr. Hackney, professor of Biological sciences. "We could have a positive or negative effect on the environment depending on how well we plan. We can continue draining and help the ecology with a little planning," says Dr. Hackney.

There was some concern as to whether or not the runoff from the parking lots threatens Bradley Creek. "Currently no one is worried about it at any level," said Carl Dempsey, Associate Vice Chancellor for Business Affairs.

Dempsey is responsible for complying with city and state ordinances. He said that he was "aware" of local ordinances. He also stated that UNCW wouldn't comply simply because they are not required to.

He follows state guidelines and pointed out protective measures taken at UNCW.

"The new pond (for erosion control) cost $100,000 that every driver on campus helped pay for," said Dempsey. "The pond also serves draining purposes for the new parking lot."

The University thrives as the town does, yet it doesn't follow their leads or concerns. The University is not required to follow municipal ordinance governing the campus. The university isn't required to stop draining runoff into Bradley Creek. Beyond all these things the city law does one thing that UNCW is weary of doing. It makes a statement. It says to other communities that we are conscious of a major problem and are willing to work toward solving it. The law doesn't harm or hinder Wilmington. It only protects the community so as to ensure further growth.

The University doesn't comply with the ordinance. It doesn't have to. It is a state institution and follows state guidelines. One would suppose that being a state supported school, the university is exempt from being concerned with the environment problems associated with economic expansion.

Race Relations Discussed

PATRICE BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

"Race relations is something that must go on everyday, a relationship [we] have to work on," Dr. Marvalene Styles Hughes impressed this point at a forum Thursday night in Room 100 of the UU entitled "Race Relations: Trends and Projections."

Hughes, who is a visiting educator at UNCW to conduct lectures with faculty and students, coordinated the discussion. In front of an audience of about 40 people, she inquired, "Where is UNCW at and where do we want to be in race relations?"

Delthea Simmons, president of the Black Student Union which sponsored the forum, said that since last semester [when fraternity pledges were accused of racism] more people have begun to understand "what's not done." The present attitude is that the racial problems are over. "Healing wounds need to take place," said Simmons.

Rodney White, president of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity, explained that the Greeks are having different functions such as dances and forums to bring the races together. Even still, no changes have taken place within the university.

Several students expressed a "cold, apathetic climate" on campus between the races and almost no interaction. Some mentioned the "segregation" of the University Union living room for example.

Frances Castillo, a sophomore, says the climate here on campus is "not very conducive of other races." "The people that come [to the forums] are somewhat enlightened" but the ones that really need it don't attend, she said.

As a solution, Hughes suggested ways of "penetrating (racist) attitudes and beliefs and reducing prejudices", especially those of students who were raised to have these attitudes. She suggested "training [for people] to be sensitive to ethnic and cultural differences, which are not differences."

Heather Sorrell, a junior at UNCW, suggested it be mandatory freshman education for students to learn how to relate with people of other races. Although Sorrell sees a lot of "voluntary segregation" in everyday campus life, most people don't see the problem.

Most of the students present Thursday night agreed these forums are helpful. Castillo says they are a "relief for built-up anger."

Although no solution was reached, Hughes said we have to "empower ourselves" and encourage student leaders to redouble their former efforts to improve race relations.

Hughes is Vice-President of Student Affairs at the University of Toledo in Toledo, Ohio and a noted educator affiliated with colleges across the country such as Tuskegee Institute and Arizona State University.

Earlier Thursday in Room 100 of the UU she addressed black students on issues in higher education and the status of blacks in the university system.

records available to the students, faculty, staff and the public.

Creating multiple locations for the election posts was third on Alston's list. "In the past we only had polls in the Union, but now we have them in the Union and in Belk Hall," she says. One can only hope that this will improve the number of students who vote, she comments.

The last item on her platform included a semi-formal dance to integrate the off-campus students with the on-campus students. The dance, held in the Fall of 1988, "was a tremendous success," she says.

With the completion of her platform goals behind her, Alston can now turn ahead to the Spring of 1989 with anticipation. "We have already designed and implemented several successful events such as the first Leadership retreat, the Miss UNCW pageant and coming soon is a book published to inform non-traditional students on their housing rights," she says.

Alston mentions that there are not any programs nor special events that are being planned right now, but she has "not ruled anything out as of yet," she says. "There is at least $20,000 of my $40,000 budget that is not allocated yet," she casually mentions, "But there is nothing special that I want to accomplish with it."

"People ask me all the time to allocate this $20,000 to all kinds of different areas of UNCW life, but it is not that simple," she says. Alston infers that she can not take $20,000 and blow it on anything she wants to get done.

As to her official responsibilities as SAG President, she says that she has to maintain and govern all student activities; so that they follow the rules of the Student Handbook. "I'm not a policeman, but someone has to make sure that the students follow the rules," she says. "Such is the extent of her duties in her own words, and according to the SGA Constitution, "The President shall act as the chief executive in the administration of all student activities."

She is also a voting member of the Board of Trustees. She comments, "I am not a passive person, but I don't want to create any problems. If I see a problem, I will confront it."

When asked to sum up her perspective on the responsibilities of President of the SGA, she remarks, "I'm there for the Senate and for the individual student. It is my job to be informed enough [about the workings of UNCW] so that I may help individual students."

Students Follow Musical Dream

BY RODNEY INGLE
STAFF WRITER

I can vividly remember the times that I used to stand in front of a mirror with a hairbrush, singing away to my favorite song on the radio. I even went as far as to try and start up bands in high school. More likely, everyone, at one time or another, wondered what it would be like to be a rock superstar.

Some people, such as myself, never could let that dream go. Though times were tough, and no one took us seriously, we had that desire to make music and stuck with it.

In high school, this was easy. We weren't really pressed to play for gigs and such, but as college drew closer, we knew that holding a band together, whose members attended different schools, would be very difficult.

Consequently, my first real band broke up when I left for college. Luckily, in late 1987, I met Lee Foy. Foy was in a band known as Desperate Strangers that had started in late 1986. After sitting in on a few "jam sessions" with my keyboard, I was invited to join the group.

This began a long musical friendship that is still growing. It also plunged me headfirst into the world of "would be" professional musicians. Believe me, you can tell the difference between a musician.

and a "would be" professional. There's a look in the would be's eye, when someone talks about music. A sparkle if you will.

Those of us who aspire to be professionals, want it so bad, that it hurts sometimes. You see those guys on MTV and think, man, our stuff is that good, why don't we get a shot to be on there.

There are two main problems that have faced our group: Desperate Strangers. First of all, when you have a group of musicians making music, you run into all different kinds of attitudes. Sometimes, this is good. It inspires that inner chemistry that makes the sounds of such bands as Poison, Def Leppard, and Pink Floyd. At other times it can cause dissension. For our band, the latter was true. We had a rhythm guitarist that was jealous of everything the other members wrote, and we had a bassist, that hated to practice, and thus, never played anything sufficiently. As a consequence, we are now a three-man band but we can still hold our own as far as gigs and such go. Where there's a will there's a way, and the three of us have that "sparkle."

The other problem, was that only Lee and I are students are UNCW. The other three members are distributed at Chapel Hill, and Gastonia Technical College. But as I said before, even distance won't daunt us.

Another problem with having a band at college, is trying to establish a balance between studying and playing. When I first brought my keyboard to school, it was a real struggle to make myself study and not work on new music ideas.

I don't believe I'm off too far when I say that all these problems, or variations of them, affect all groups at one time or another.

It's important to let other people know that it's not a bed of roses, even on a college band scale. Sure, its fun to sing in front of a lot of people, and be recognized for a talent, but it takes a lot of initiative, and a good balance of practice, devotion, and compromise to make it work, and to achieve that "look." And you've got to juggle all of this, along with busting your behind for that degree.

So, what is the biggest problem with a young musician? Foy comments, "Getting people to take you seriously from the outset. For the longest time, I would talk about the band and people would say, 'Oh, that's nice.' I just wanted to shake them and say, 'Take me seriously!'"

"Even my parents thought it was all just a passing thing. Now, three years strong, and with books full of original songs that people really like, people are finally saying, 'Man, those guys really were serious!' There are many musicians on campus. Some play alone, and some such as Little Green Men, Valence, Passages, Crystal Image, and Desperate Strangers are groups who have made a mark locally, and are striving to gain an even larger listening audience via tapes, records, and recording contracts.

There is a vital point that I have been trying to make throughout this article. Whatever your dream is, hang on to it! Whether it is to be a famous musician, artist, lawyer, whatever.

As far as musicians go, you guys know what needs to be done. Mack Tucker, drummer for Little Green Men, comments, "You can't approach music with a half-ass attitude. Your biggest hindrance is yourself. If you're in it for the parties and the people you meet, you might as well get out now. Sometimes, I get too devoted to it. I forget that I'm a student musician, and music takes over. It is an internal struggle for dominance, and I have to find a happy medium. If you're really serious about it though, you are able to keep a level head concerning scholastic priorities."

I hope this article has helped to inspire some and to open the eyes of others. As a fellow musician and student, to all of you with high hopes for the future, if you really, really want it, hang on tight, close your eyes, and never let go. The dream is yours for the taking!

Competition Winners to Perform

(PRESS RELEASE) Winners of the annual Student Concerto Competition will be featured when the Wilmington Symphony performs Saturday, Feb. 18, 8:00 PM, in Kenan Auditorium.

Christopher Davis, a student at South Brunswick High School, will perform the first two movements of Cimarosa's "Oboe Concerto" with the orchestra. Larry McLendon, a UNC-W music major, will play the first movement of "Concerto in G" for piano, by Ravel. Included on the evening's program will be Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5."

General admission is $5.00, students and senior citizens $3.00. For further information, call 791-9262.

Valence Live!

MICHELLE BRUCE
STAFF WRITER

Three UNCW students make up the successful local band Valence. Their high energy style and driving beat have made their Eastern Carolinas shows fun and entertaining for all.

Mark Graham, bassist and vocalist, attributes this to the enjoyment the band has playing. The skillful musicianship is shown best in their complex original tunes. Their twenty originals have been played live, and most have been recorded at Creative Convergence Studios here in Wilmington, to be released March 30, available at School Kids and Valence shows.

"We are very excited about the cassette release, it's an opportunity to get the word out, get some radio play, and pay a few bills."

In addition to the cassette release, the band is looking forward to playing here in Wilmington at the Mad Monk, March 30. "We really enjoy interacting with the crowd, especially in our home town. We love the enthusiasm and have fun playing our music."

Valence's vast repertoire of cover tunes and over twenty original songs have been well received from Raleigh and

MOVIE REVIEW
ALLEN RAY

WORKING GIRL. Starring Melanie Griffith, Harrison Ford, Sigourney Weaver. Working Girl is a modern day business world "Cinderella," starring Melanie Griffith as Tess McGill, a New York City secretary who aspires to be a success in the business world. Tess (Griffith) is a little naive about the ways of the system and is exploited by bosses who either want to get her in bed or use her skills without giving her credit. Sigourney Weaver plays her devious boss whose ego is almost as big as New York. Harrison Ford plays Jack Trainer, a businessman who falls for Tess and tries to help her make her way through a business deal. This movie is funny, sexy, but a little predictable. Go see it anyway. 3 1/2 stars.

HER ALIBI. Starring Tom Selleck and Paulina Porizkova. Her Alibi stars Tom Selleck and super-model Paulina Porizkova in a suspenseful, intriguing murder mystery. Selleck plays a writer who goes to court to find ideas for a book, but instead finds Paulina accused of murder with no alibi. Selleck decides to lie and give her an alibi, but soon he can't decide if this was a mistake or not because he begins to believe she did it. Paulina proves to be as good an actress as she is beautiful, and Selleck is very convincing. Many twists, turns and laughs. Her Alibi is an entertaining movie. 4 stars.

Foreign Film Review

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

La Ciudad y los perros (The City and the Dogs) is a Peruvian film shown by the Department of Modern Languages February 12. It is an adaptation of Mario Vargas Llosa's 1962 novel directed by Francisco Lombardi. Set in Lima in a military school, the film deals with the survival of truth in a corrupted society.

The opening scene shows the school's senior cadets forcing other students to crawl and bark like dogs. There is, however, one student who refuses to comply. This tall, blond young man fends off the seniors with his belt and becomes known as the Jaguar. This character is respected and greatly feared by the other cadets. Jaguar becomes the ringleader of a group called the Circle which provides such prohibited goods as cigarettes, alcohol, and the first answers for a price. As the film progresses, it becomes evident that almost all of the students are availing themselves of Jaguar's services.

Truth is repeatedly trampled and sullied by students and officers alike. The cadets are concerned only with beating the system and the faculty members are more concerned with minor infractions like talking after lights out than the death of a student under suspicious circumstances. The school's creed of discipline, morality, and work is a mockery.

Against the backdrop of vice and corruption there is no one who rises up as a hero. The one officer, Lt. Gamboa, who at first attempts to work for truth fails miserably. In his cynicism, he becomes corrupt himself. Another character, Alberto, struggles to get at the truth out of loyalty to his dead friend, Ricardo. He fails because he gives up too easily.

At the end of the film Alberto and Jaguar, the one loyal to his friend and the other responsible for his death, are drawn together. The force that joins the two is their willingness to face the truth that everyone else is avoiding. Both Alberto and Jaguar perceive the evil of Ricardo's death as being shadowed by a still greater evil, the true evil of the film, which is the concealment of the crime by the officers' refusal to look into the matter.

La ciudad y los perros is an interesting psychological drama. It is a serious, "thinking man's" movie and it is excellent.

The Department of Modern Languages will present the next movie of its spring series, Tiempo de Revancha (Time for Revenge) February 19 at 2:30 p.m. in the library auditorium. The film has won awards for Best Film and Best Actor at the Chicago Film Festival. It is a gripping tale of one man's fight against a corrupt company.

Artists Grants Available

BY RODNEY T. INGLE
STAFF WRITER

The Arts Council of the Lower Cape Fear, in conjunction with the North Carolina Arts Council and Cape Fear Community Foundation, are sponsoring a grant program for up and coming artists of all types.

It is called The Emerging Artists Grant Program, and it's goal is to give support to young and old (age isn't a factor) who are talented in visual, performing, literary and interdisciplinary art.

All artists are eligible for the grant, as it is open to all art forms. However, the artist must have either resided in New Hanover County for at least a year, or have been employed there for at least a year.

This is the first year that the E.A.G. program has existed. The first application deadline was January 16, with the winners to be announced by March 1, 1989. Their projects must be completed by June 30, 1989.

Being that there is a limit to the amount of money that an artist can receive, it is unlikely that projects needing more than $1000 will be funded), things such as scholarships and capital equipment: (a computer for a writer or a keyboard for a musician for example) will not be applicable for the grant.

For further information and to obtain an application, call Amy Brannock (919) 763-ARTS, or write: Arts Council of the Lower Cape Fear (mailing address) P.O. Box 212, Wilmington, N.C. 28402; (street address) 20 Market Street, Wilmington, N.C. 28401.

Art Thefts and Vandalism Plague Campus Museums and Exhibits

(CPS)--There has been a run of art thefts and vandalism at Southeast Louisiana University, the University of Pennsylvania and several other campus museums and galleries in recent months, forcing officials to increase security measures and, in some cases, close exhibits to students.

Officials at Penn, for example, have tightened security and closed a hands-on art display for the blind after the Sri Lankan mask valued at $400 disappeared Nov. 18.

The theft came just one week after the world's second largest crystal ball and a 2,000-year-old statuette of the Egyptian god Osiris were stolen.

At Southeastern Louisiana, vandals smashed and pilfered a student art exhibit.

As a result, campus security director Ross Martin figured that it is almost impossible to keep such art objects safe while letting the public see them, without new restrictions.

"Unless you have it on display in a vault, this is one of the risks you run," Martin said.

"If someone wants to break in and vandalize or steal something, they'll do it."

Penn spokeswoman Molly Stockdale agreed, saying her school's new security measures were necessary, but at least let the public see the art.

"Having objects under plexiglass doesn't give them the same feel, but it helps to establish their value," she said. "You appreciate them more."

Campus museums have long been a favorite target for thieves and vandals. Brigham Young University and the universities of Colorado, California-Berkeley and Arizona, among others have been targets in past years.

The problem is international, moreover. Paris police arrested a West German art student Jan. 21 for stealing about $3.2 million from various galleries.

"I just wanted to admire them quietly at home," student Florian Feidler explained to police.

It's hard to install security measures to stop such thefts because campus museums generally are tight on budgets, University of Arizona museum director Peter Birmingham complained.

It took theft of a $400,000 painting for administrators to equip the museum with an electronic surveillance system and a second full-time guard. Both of which Birmingham had requested for years.

"It was a painful loss," he said "but at least the new system will make it more difficult in the future."

Pie Man Attacks!

(CPS)--Baylor University's Pie Man, or someone just like him, has returned.

A long-haired man recently barged into a business class, ran up to student Jim Wyatt, and hit him in the face with a pie.

I was just sitting in class looking at my notes when I heard this guy say 'hey' and then I looked up into a pie," Wyatt recalled.

When Wyatt left class to clean up, he was pied again in the restroom.

Meanwhile, back in the classroom, the Pie Man stuck his head into the room and yelled "Hey Gina, you're next" to another student, Prof. Leslie Rasher reported.

Tennis, Anyone?

Some observations about a tennis match I saw last weekend at a club in my hometown.

The two little boys had just exchanged handshakes and gratuities when the smaller of the two, dressed in red shorts with a blue collarless tee-shirt suggested to his friend, a somewhat larger boy of similar age, that the two should play some sort of sport.

The two boys began playing tennis. The smaller boy, bothered by the 95-degree temperature and the hot Carolina sun, complained often, but continued playing. He won the third and fourth games but his friend, who was not as bothered by the heat, won games one, two, five, six, seven, and eight to win the first set, six games to two.

To be fair, the boys exchanged ends of court after every odd game.

The larger boy, the winner of the first set, began the second in similar fashion, winning the first three games of set number two. However, his friend, the smaller boy, won the next five games and was serving for the second set, and more importantly, he supposed, to tie this friendly match at one set apiece.

He double faulted for love-fifteen. He then hit a serve straight down the center line that his friend called out.

The little boy began to cry. He threw his racket. He called his friend all types of not-so-friendly names, names 10 year old boys should not even know exist. The larger boy, who was still trailing in the set, remained firm and the smaller boy served his second serve. It too, landed close to the center line and it too was called out, giving the larger boy a love-thirty-lead.

Again the small boy cried. A man, who sat in what looked to be an oversized high chair, positioned precisely in the middle of the green clay court, quickly stepped down from his lofty view and began talking to the little boy.

"Son," the man began, "this is only a game. You mustn't take it so hard. I'm sure your parents are proud of you regardless."

The small boy, drying his teary eyes with his sweat soaked shirt, sheepishly mumbled, "Ok" and went back to serve. The man returned to his seat, tugging at his "Kildaire Farms Country Club" cap as he climbed to his designated perch.

The second set ended when the larger boy returned a serve into the net. That's the nearest thing about tennis, you cannot ever lose as long as you win the last point.

After a fifteen minute intermission the boys returned refreshed and eager to play. The sun had taken shelter, giving way to a glorious Autumn sunset whose beauty would have been worthy of post-card consideration. Cooler temperatures had forced everyone to don heavier clothing. Bright Filatee-shirts gave way to dark blue sweats which were provided by the sponsoring company, Ellesse.

The two boys did not take long in returning to top form. The larger boy, who won the first set by rushing the net and clipping away volleys for winners, won the first two games by executing the same tactics. The small boy, now crying in between every lost point, retaliated by winning the next three games by continually lobbing his larger, less agile opponent.

Game six was held on serve by the larger boy, tying the score at three games apiece, one set apiece. He squared up the match by hitting a drop shot from the baseline at forty-third. John McEnroe would not try such a shot at such an important time.

The small boy got ready to open game seven. The little boy could not help but feel the pressure. While other ten year olds were playing in neighborhood pools, these two youngsters were playing for some silly adult-devised ranking that states that one tennis player is better than another tennis player.

Both boys hit many high arching shots afraid to hit the net. Finally, after some thirty exchanges the small boy netted a backhand. His father screamed at him to bear down and concentrate. Why any ten year old should ever be forced to bear down and concentrate is beyond any and all reasonable expectation.

The second point was almost as long, and more exciting. A rapid exchange of volleys resulted in an easy overhead for the smaller boy. And had his father not previously scolded him for faulty play, he would have easily and carefully hit it for a winner. The kid whiffed, probably for the first time in five years. Pressure can cause some pretty strange things to occur. The boy, tears running down his red cheeks, looked up to his father, who was incidentally, looking down at his son.

The final two points of the game and the next two games were simply a formality.

A small boy shot a silly tennis match. Upon shaking his friends hand, he smiled. It was the first time in over two and one-half hours that either player showed emotional satisfaction. Unbelievable.

ECU, Navy Win CAA Championships

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Splash! Splash!, They're breaking swim records in Trask!

Swimmers across the eastern seaboard invaded the Seahawk Natatorium to compete for the 1989 swimming crown of the CAA conference and qualify for the Easterns Championships, to be held in March.

When all the wakes had settled in the waterways East Carolina's men and U.S. Naval Academy's ladies stood highest on the victory platform. The Purple Pirates were led by Tom Holsten's double gold victories in the 200 fly and 400 IM. They also placed in the top three in 16 of the 20 events of the competition and had at least one swimmer in every final.

The U.S. Navy never challenged the dominating ECU gang and had to rely on their strength in the diving venue to hold off an up and coming Richmond squad.

The diving efforts of Brad Baell, Paul Feduchak, and Steve Rutherford kept Navy's hopes afloat by claiming the 2nd and 3rd places spots on both boards. The University of Richmond, on a strong performance on the final day of competition leapfrogged from fifth position to edge out James Madison by one point to capture third place in the conference.

The Seahawks finished fifth and sixth in the men's and women's fields.

"I feel we have better swimming ahead. A lot of an individuals came down with the flu prior to the Championships and that effected our performance to a certain degree," said Coach Dave Allen.

Nick Revelas, Mary Tarter, Laurie Grant, and Mary Beth Mills were the top Seahawk swimmers in the championship. Revelas won the 100 fly in a time of 51.19 and Tarter placed second in the 200 breaststroke behind ECU's Merideth Bridgers who shattered her own CAA record by two second in 2:21.27.

The only multiple winners for the Hawks were Grant and Mills. Mills wowed the crowd on the one meter diving board by executing difficult dives with seemingly relative ease that earned her many "oohs" and "aahs" from a packed crowd of Hawk's fans.

Mary Beth's score of 390.85 was good enough to edge out JMU's Heather Stewart (390.50) for second place behind Navy's Stacia Johnson (424.20).

On the three board Mills once again showed her poise and talents by grabbing her second medal with a third place finished. Mills overcame some technical mistakes in the earlier rounds and finished with a flurry to wrestle the bronze medal away from Stewart.

"She's doing an excellent job of fulfilling her competition diving. She worked hard and it is paying off," said a pleased Diving Coach Marc Ellington.

Laurie Grant was a double medalist for the Seahawks also. She placed third in both the 100 and 200 backstroke finals with times of 1:01.12 and 2:12.20. She also qualified for the 50 free final in which she finished seventh despite having her best time in the event.

The Seahawks put many swimmers into the finals and almost all of them equaled or beat their best times. However, the experience and the strength of the other clubs namely ECU, Navy, and Richmond had too much power and talent to overcome.

"Everyone swam their best time. We were really happy that we did the best we could. Depth hurt us the most," said Seahawk swimmer Mike Maher.

All in all the Championships here had a little bit of everything. There were 12 CAA records broken in the Seahawk Natatorium. ECU's Merideth Bridges and American's Nicole Fiori did it twice. There was the drama of Mary Beth Mills' comeback on the three meter board and Richmond team's stealing of third place in the conference.

And yes, like every good thing there was a little bit of controversy, the touch center platform wall of the eight lane didn't work on the main scoreboard timer and there was that mysterious time trial between a William and Mary and a Richmond swimmer that took place during the diving competition. Most of the swimmers seemed pleased with the Championships that the Seahawks had hosted.

"The meet ran smoothly and this pool real fast," commented Americans Melissa Rimaldi.

"There were alot of good schools down here competing," said Navy swimmer Dora Lockwood. "This meet wasn't as fast as last time but the schools were much more competitive. The meet was run very well," said William and Mary Head Coach Anne Howes.

Howes was named the women coach of the year when the Lady Tribe finished second (621.5) to Navy (817).

ECU's Rick Kobe was named the men's coach of the year. The athlete of the year honors went to American's Nicole Fiori, who shattered two CAA marks.

When the last award was handed out the Seahawks had placed 16 men and seven women into the Easterns Championships to be held in early March. The women will travel to West Virginia University to swim while the men head up north to University of Cleveland in Ohio.

Lady Hawks Lose Again

BY TASHA BOONE
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

The Lady Seahawks have had a disappointing week, with losses to Campbell, George Mason, and James Madison, the girls have been struggling since their last win on February 4th. On Feb. 9 the Hawks traveled to Campbell University to play the Lady Camels with high ambitions on defeating them.

However, their hopes were dashed when the Lady Seahawks suffered a severe loss 74-87.

When they last met in Trask, the Hawks won in a tight game ending 86-83. After making the first basket, the Lady Camels pretty much dominated the game.

The Lady Seahawks could not seem to gain an edge against their opponent. By cutting Charlene Page off from the baseline, they managed to stop one of Page's key roles in the game. Although the Seahawks out rebounded the Lady Camels, their offensive rebounds did not produce coherent shots. Whereas, the Camels were able to turn their offensive rebounds into points.

Tressa Resse performed an outstanding job hitting for 23 (her career high) points which included four three point range. The second highest scorer was Charlene Page with 16. Other double figure scorers included Jennifer Bennett 14 pts. and Kelly Kincaid 11. The top rebounders were Jennifer with 13 and Kincaid with 10.

Saturday in Trask Coliseum, the Patriots met the Seahawks on their home turf. Both teams started off playing excellent defense; however, soon the Hawk's strong defense melted away. Throughout the duration of the game, Hawks stayed on an average of ten points behind always struggling for points. Many shots that were put up by the Hawks were missed, while the Lady Patriots were consistent in their shooting from the field. A final score of 71-60 was displayed at the buzzer.

Once again sophomore Tressa Resse was top scorer hitting 19, including 3 three pointers and Page was one behind with 18 pts. The rebounder was Rosalyn Flood with 7.

When the Lady Seahawks last confronted James Madison, they lost 90-56. The Seahawks were prepared to do battle again on February 13 in Trask. The game went neck and neck until about nine minutes were left in the first half. Seven minutes on the game clock and Hawks were down by 10, 22-32.

After half-time Resse comes back and opens second half with one of her four three pointers of the night. Jennifer Bennett banked home two as she put Hawks at the half century mark. With 2:53 left in the game Flood steals the ball and lays it up pushing Hawks to 60-75. Yet, things looked bleak as the game ended with a final score of 60-77.

This time around Page was the top scorer hitting a cool 20, and Resse trailed right behind with 19. Resse was also the top rebounder with 14. Resse has at average of 20 points per game, good enough for a share of the lead in scoring with Page. All in all, the Lady Seahawks played an excellent, hustling game against the undefeated Lady Ducks compared to when they last met.

An unidentified UNCW baseball player takes a few practice swings in preparation of Saturday's afternoon game. The Seahawks resume their spring season with hope on improving from last year's disappointing 4-10 conference record and a quick exit out of last year CAA Tournament. The Seahawks will mix youthful rookies and seasoned veterans. They will also rely on Eric Hickman's hot bat and a strong defense to compete successfully with perennial powers of JMU and ECU. This year UNCW will host the CAA championships for the first time at Brooks Field.

IceHawks Resume Ways- Skate to 5-1 Win

BY MAI NGUYEN

"This is the way hockey should be played-fast and savage!" exclaimed a delighted referee in the aftermath of an exhaustive game between UNCW's "IceHawks" and the local Pool Specialists. Although the Seahawks were coming off a loss to the Black Hockey Team (named for the color of their jerseys), they were eager to resume a new winning streak. Last week's loss was attributed to lack of teamwork.

Prior to the game, president Jeff Silverman revealed the team's strategy to outlast the relatively older opponents. Using fresh substitutions frequently, the Hawks would be able to conserve energy and consequently bear down fiercely on the stamina of the Specialists. Those tactics were shown to be quite effective as the Hawks slid away with victory, winning 5-1.

The first of the three 16-minute periods was significant in that it revealed the precision with which the UNCW players executed their passes. Shinning brightly in their heavy armor, the three man offense and two man defense crew often times coalesced to prevent the Specialists from penetrating their territory.

The pinnacle of the second period occurred when two opposing players became entangled in a fight over the puck. As the other players joined in, elbow flew, hockey sticks soared, and bodies crashed up against the boards. Although no injuries were sustained, two Hawks were benched two minutes for fighting. Despite the disadvantage, Brad "Slash" Sekulich slapped the puck past the goalie's looming right half to score a short handed goal.

In the final period of the game, the Specialists seemed to lose their concentration as they let the Hawks repeatedly penetrate the defense.

Integral assists were made by Buck Rowlee and Howie Malloy. Junior Carl Potter manipulated the puck to score two of the five goals.

Sophomore Scott "Barney" Petersen comments that it was "A great improvement from last week's game in that we played more as a team." Another revelation on the team's success came from Potter who believed the consolidation of the defensive and offensive lines was the reason behind the victory.

One of the main strengths of the team lies in the experience of the hockey players from the North. Since the team is composed primarily of Vermont, New York, Michigan and New Jersey natives, the basic framework of experience is covered. Thus far, the hockey record stands 4-1.

Games are played each Monday night and admission is only one dollar so come out and support your Hawks on ice.

Drama Auditions for "The Diviners"

Auditions for UNCW Drama's production of "The Diviners" by James Leonard will be held Feb. 27 and 28 in the S.R.O. Theatre in Kenan Hall on the UNCW campus. The production will be performed April 12-16.

"The Diviners" is set in the midwest in the 1930's and is about a traumatized boy and a reluctant preacher who hopes to help him. There are roles for five women and seven men. Frank Trimble will direct the play, which is the last of four plays produced by the UNCW Department of Creative Arts for the 1988-1989 season. Costumes will be designed by Caroline DeMoss, with scenery and lighting designed by Tom Macle.

For more information about "Painting Churches" or UNCW's drama season call the Department of Creative Arts at 395-3440.

Intruders Found Showering in Graham

BY GREG GERRANS

STAFF WRITER

In two separate incidents, three residents of Graham Residence Hall discovered uninvited guests in their showers last Wednesday, Feb. 15. Roommates John Dean and Matt Barbour, and Patrick Fowler were shocked to find male construction workers using the showers designated for their suite.

"We noticed our soap & shampoo missing, but we didn't pay much attention to it," said Barbour a freshman business major. "Then we came in and found dirty clothes, tools, and muddy boots scattered on the floor."

Dean felt too shocked to react. "I asked them if they were almost through," he said. He went on to say that they laughed and continued showering while making obscene gestures. Barbour noted that his tooth brush and deodorant had been used.

Dean went to report the incident to his Residence Director, Kevin Colaner. During this time the two men left, taking various toilet articles and a new shaving kit. Barbour had received the kit as a Christmas present. The kit and contents were valued at $60.00.

Fowler, a Graham Hall sophomore had a day previously discovered a man in his bathroom. "I came in and found clothes all over the floor, and saw a man standing in front of the mirror," he said. "I didn't call anyone because I didn't know who he was."

Colaner observed the two men leaving the campus on foot. He then reported the occurrence to his superiors, Margaret Robison, Head of Auxiliary Services and Jim Anderson, Area Coordinator.

Mr. Anderson said that he was vaguely aware of the incident and that there had been no official report filed. "We haven't had any other complaints," said Anderson. "If students notice something suspicious then it is their responsibility to report it to RA on duty." Anderson also stated that if students would lock their doors or call Campus Security,

SGA Fianance Committee Attempts Drastic Changes

BY RICK HEYMANN

STAFF WRITER

On Monday, February 19, Senator Lee Barnhill introduced a new bill to the SGA that calls for heavy-handed budget cuts that will affect over half of the 31 presently funded student organizations.

If approved by the SGA on Monday, February 27, the new proposal will go into effect shortly after the SGA elections on March 31.

"There needs to be a limit on the amount of money clubs receive. We can't let organizations have as much money as they want, because it does not serve the student body well," Barnhill said.

The reason for developing this legislation is quite clear. There had never been budget guidelines for the SGA to follow, although unwritten rules were used to guide previous SGA budgets.

"Another factor that demanded this legislation included the fact that we had a budgeting fiasco last year," said Barnhill.

Although Barnhill would not comment on the SGA budgeting "fiasco" of last year, he did infer that there existed severe money mismanagement. Because of this, Barnhill feels that the Senate "will almost undoubtedly pass" the new legislation.

A vote was not taken on the new bill because the Senators did not believe that they knew enough about the six page proposal yet.

"Our budget committee will meet on Thursday, February 23 to review the legislation with the Senators that may have questions," Barnhill commented. "We may even make a few minor changes in the wording, but we won't change the basic principles."

The proposal that the BPC (Budget and Planning Committee) wrote concerns itself with three major points.

The first point deals with the type of club that will receive future funding. "All organizations that are politically oriented or endorse political figures, and all religious clubs will no longer receive funds," said Barnhill.

Also, all academic organizations will have a $500 ceiling placed on their account, he inferred.

"This is not to say that a club cannot lobby for funding if they fall into these categories, because I have placed a clause in the proposal that will allow for a bending of the rules in an extreme case, but chances are that they won't get funded," stated Barnhill.

Furthermore, any club that selects its new members through a vote of its existing members will not get money from the SGA.

The second point that the proposed legislation makes concerns the funding process itself.

In the past, the entire SGA would debate over the amount of money that the club asked for. Barnhill stated, "this whole process would take two or three Senate meetings. It just took too much time!"

According to the pending legislation, a portfolio concerning the clubs needs would be debated in the BPC, not the entire Senate.

The results that the BPC extrapolated would be sent to the entire Senate for approval. If these results were not approved, then the portfolio would return to the BPC for further debate.

Barnhill and Susan Wolfson, also a Senator on the BPC, commented that this new procedure would save a vast amount of time.

The third point that the legislation calls for concerns the

Hewlett, A Great Contributor Dies

KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

Addison Hewlett Jr., local politician, lawyer, and key figure in the development of UNCW, died Sunday, February 5.

Hewlett, 76, who died of a heart attack, played an important role in the transformation of Wilmington College into UNCW during the late 1960's.

"[Hewlett] brought Wilmington College, which was no more than an extension of the New Hanover School system, to [existence] as a university. [By doing this, he] served the people of the region who needed a place [of higher education] for the veterans to return to," said M. Tyrone Rowell, Associate Vice Chancellor of University Advancement.

Because Wagoner was unavailable for comment, George E. Bair, Special Asst. to the Chancellor, said, "Chancellor Wagoner thought Hewlett was an extraordinarily gentle and kind person."

One of his most important roles was as spokesperson on behalf of the university. He was also especially effective at convincing other philanthropic persons to contribute [to UNCW]."

Carl J. Dempsey, personal friend of Hewlett and Vice Chancellor for Business Affairs at UNCW, said that "Hewlett was tireless in his support of UNCW."

As a graduate of Wake Forest College, where he also received his Law degree, Hewlett felt a great need that there be a university in Wilmington for local students to attend, said Dempsey.

Hewlett's wife, Croquette, said that his desire for a local university stems back almost 76 years.

"In 1913, Addison's mother stood out in front of her school on Masonboro Sound Road and addressed a crowd, predicting that one day there would be a university in Wilmington. He worked hard to make that dream come true," said Mrs. Hewlett.

In order to fulfill his mother's dream, Hewlett assisted in almost every aspect of development for this university.

Housing Fair Offers UNCW Students Great Opportunity

FROM STAFF REPORTS

Students will finally have the chance to preview many of the local apartment complexes without the hassle of driving around town to do it when UNCW holds its first annual Housing Fair.

Wednesday, March 1, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. in room 100 of the University Union, representatives from approximately 20 Wilmington apartment complexes will be on hand to provide information and materials to UNCW students.

"This opportunity is being provided for students to personally talk with apartment managers and landlords and to help students learn to make well informed decisions about off-campus living," explained Jacqueline Skinner, assistant dean of students.

Following the Housing Fair will be a "Landlord/Tenant Forum" from 4 - 5:30 p.m. in room 100 of the Union. This is a follow-up to the forum held for students in January. Area landlords and UNCW students will be able to ask question on landlord and tenant rights and responsibilities. Mallam Maynard, attorney for the Legal Services of the Lower Cape Fear, is the scheduled guest speaker.

These programs are being coordinated by the Dean of Students Office; both sessions are free and area landlords are invited to attend.

For additional information, contact Jacqueline Skinner, 395-3119.

"Painting Churches" Is Exciting & Heartwarming

BY RODNEY INGLE
STAFF WRITER

Tuesday night, I had the privilege of witnessing the dress rehearsal for the University Theatre's production of Painting Churches by Tina Howe.

The first thing that caught my eye when I walked in, was the nicely prepared set. Not much is ever said about the set itself. Compliments should be given to Tom Macie, technical director, and all of the scenic construction crew. The set gave just the right atmosphere, without being overbearing, or upstaging the actors and actresses.

The part of "Mags" was portrayed very well by Hillary Russell. She had a sweetness in her countenance that was only surpassed by her obvious passion for art. In Act II, scene 1, there is a section where "Mags" reprimands her mother for teasing "Gardner" (father of Mags). It was very moving; enough to make me a bit misty-eyed.

"Fanny," (mother of Mags) was played by Juli Brockmann, who also did a splendid job. She had an air about her that spoke of regality, and a brash mouth, that could bring laughter to anyone. Brockmann puts a lot of feeling into this role. Even at some rough areas of dialogue, she incorporates the slips of the tongue so well into her character, one would think it to be part of the script.

Randy Soare played a superb "Gardner." The first time that he entered, I broke into a smile, and as I glanced around, so did everyone else. Soare instantly becomes the typical "senile old man," that everyone falls in love with. His stumbling feet and mind really break up the audience. However, there are times when his face is so empty, one feels alone and deserted just looking at him. He is so blissfully ignorant of the world around him, that one can't help but feel sorrow for him.

Of course, the superb acting was only enhanced by the excellent job of the Makeup crew; hats off to you ladies and gentlemen, and congratulations to Dr. Terry Rogers for an excellent job of directing.

Overall, this was a very exciting and heart-warming experience for me. This drama is a "Must See" for everyone. It runs from February 22 through 24 at 8:00 p.m., and February 25 at 2:30 p.m. at the S.R.O. Theatre. Don't miss it, it is an extraordinary performance... Bravo!

Keaggy & Stonehill Bring 'Live Aid' Feeling to UNCW

With Hands Across America and Band-Aid, fund raisers and consciousness-raising experiences have, in the recent past, become très vogue. UNC-W will soon be the site for one of these much sought after experiences. Musicians Phil Keaggy and Randy Stonehill will be performing in a World Hunger Benefit Concert Thursday, March 2 at 7:30 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium. The benefit is sponsored by the Association of Campus Entertainment Concerts Committee, Campus Crusade for Christ, and Wilmington Area Youth Groups. Opening act for the concert will be British comedy team, Phil and John. Half of the proceeds will go to Compassion International and will be used to feed and clothe children in Haiti.

Both Keaggy and Stonehill are renowned recording artists.

Keaggy is a world-class guitarist who first gained fame in the late sixties with the band: Glass Harp, Synergy, and It Makes Me Glad. Phil left Glass Harp in 1972 and released the first of many solo albums two years later.

In addition to being a popular performer, Randy Stonehill is a gifted composer who writes almost all of his own music. His albums include Equator, Celebrate This Heartbeat, Love Beyond Reason, The Wild Frontier, and Can't Buy a Miracle. Stonehill has written with Keith Green and recorded a duet with Amy Grant called "I Could Never Say Goodbye." Stonehill says, "Phil and I are excited to be able to tour together this year." In addition to their friendship, both artists are bound together by their interest in helping needy children. Keaggy and Stonehill have each traveled in third world countries with Compassion International and are strong supporters of the organization.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at the University Union Information Center and at Cox Christian Bookstores. Advance tickets are $2 for students and $4 for all others. Any ticket remaining on the day of the show will be available at the door for $3 and $5 for students and others respectively.

MOVIE REVIEW

ALLEN RAY

Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure **** 1/2

Starring Keanu Reeves (Ted) George Carlin (Rufus)

Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure is about two aspiring rock musicians who dream of becoming superstars and the only thing stopping them is the fact that they are failing history and Bill's father wants to send him to Military School in Alaska. Facing being separated Bill and Ted try to study but too no avail until they are helped by Rufus, a travel guide from the future who unlocks the past for them. Bill and Ted travel through time collecting famous figures from the past including Socrates, Genghis Khan, Joan of Arc, Napoleon and Billy the Kid just to name a few for their final history project. This movie was a lot like Fast Times at Ridgemont High meets Back to the Future with Bill and Ted saying "dude" and "excellent" for 90% of their dialogue. Even though it was a little long Bill and Ted's Excellent is a funny movie with clever jokes, good special effects and special appearances by Clarence Clemons (Bruce Springsteen's E. Street Band), Fe Wwayl (The Tubes), Martha Davis (The Motels), Jane Weidman (The Go Go's) and former UNCW student James Nelson.

Entertainment Opportunities

The UNCW Jazz Combo and Jazz Fusion Group, directed by Frank Bongiorno, will present a concert at 3 p.m. on Sunday, February 26 in Kenan Auditorium on the UNCW Campus. Admission is $2.00, UNCW students free.

The Jazz Fusion Group will perform "rock" flavored jazz compositions by well-known jazz artist and pedagogue, David N. Baker. Baker has recorded with such artists and George Russell and Eric Dolphy, and is presently Director of Jazz Studies at Indiana University.

The Jazz Combo will be performing a variety of mainstream jazz styles from blues, such as Cedar's Blues to the contemporary McCoy Tyner influenced composition, The Real McCoy.

For more information contact the Music Division 395-3390.

The Blockade Runner Resort Hotel is pleased to announce that it has been chosen to host the Salem ProSail Series Wrightsville Beach. This will be the first professional sailboat race to be held in North Carolina waters.

On April 8th and 9th, approximately 35 to 40 Hobie 21's and 10 ProSail 40's will vie for thousands of dollars in prize money. ProSail 40's are monster 40 foot catamarans capable of speeds in excess of 25 knots. Famous names in sailing such as Tom Blackaller, Dennis Connors and Hobie Alter, Jr. are potential competitors.

The race course will be set on the ocean immediately off Wrightsville Beach with the starting and finishing buoys in front of the Blockade Runner and the windward and leeward marks off Johnnie Mercers and Crystal fishing piers. The race schedule including wildcard qualifying races will be announced shortly.

The Thalian Association Children's Theatre will present two old time melodramas, THE MINER'S DAUGHTER and THE PERILS OF FRISCILLA, February 24 thru 26 at Jacob's Run, 208 Market Street.

Performances on February 24 will be at 7 p.m.; at 3 and 7 p.m. on February 25; and at 3 p.m. on February 26. Admission will be $1.50 for children and $3.00 for adults. Group discounts are available for 10 or more people.

Tickets will be available at the door an hour before performances or may be reserved and obtained from the box office located at 118 Princess Street. The reservation telephone number is 763-3398.

(OPERA HOUSE) Opera House Theater Company is proud to present the big, brassy musical "Sweet Charity" opening on February 22nd at the Scottish Rite Temple, 1415 South 17th Street, Wilmington, N.C. The book is by Neil Simon with unforgettable songs and music by Dorothy Fields and Cy Coleman such as "Big Spender" and "If My Friends Could See Me Now". Keith Keen, who directed and choreographed the hit "42nd Street" for Opera House this past summer, is the director and choreographer of "Sweet Charity" so the audience can expect incredible dance numbers, comedy, and an unforgettable evening of entertainment. Alexis Chieffetz stars as Charity.

the dance hall hostess who is searching for the man of her dreams. An outstanding cast featuring Richard Bunting, Diandra Mundy, Paul Mixon, Jennifer Adcock, Tina-Renee Del Conte, Corey D. Mitchell, Fred DeJaco and a delightful and talented ensemble guarantee an outstanding theatrical evening.

The production dates are February 22nd through February 26th and March 3rd through March 5th. All performances are at 8:00 p.m. For further information and reservations, call the Center Box Office, 118 Princess Street, 763-3398 or 763-9328. Tickets are also available at the door on the nights of performance.

UNCW Chamber Singers On The Move In Spring '89

BY RODNEY INGLE
STAFF WRITER

The UNCW Chamber Singers are a select group of performers, who represent the University by conducting various musical tours, throughout the school semester. Members are selected by audition, from the entire student body, by Dr. Joe Hickman; director.

This tour, which begins February 23-26, will include schools in Fayetteville, Chapel Hill, Charlotte, Smithfield and Goldsboro. It will also allow the choir to represent UNCW at the Intercollegiate Choral Festival being held at UNC-Greensboro on Saturday 24. The Chamber Singers will be one of 12 choirs representing their schools at this festival.

Their musical program, which includes such songs as Exultate Deo, Vinea mea electa, Canticle: The Hungry Angels, Schenandoah and Hold On to mention a few, is a collage of different styles and languages. It includes modern, sacred, black-spiritual, and contemporary arrangements of songs. It also requires the Chamber Singers to be able to sing in about 4 different languages: English, German, Latin and French.

"A lot of hard work goes into preparing for these tours," says Hickman. "This program has met with great success in previous concerts. It's well-prepared and well-learned. These students are making music on a highly professional level."

Dr. Dennis J. Spore, Chairman of the Creative Arts Dept. stated that this particular group of Chamber Singers was "...the best group of Chamber Singers that has been produced at UNCW."

In the past, the Chamber Singers have represented UNCW well, on tours that included New York, Washington D.C., Williamsburg VA., Charleston, S.C. and New Orleans as well as a number of N.C. concerts. However, they haven't stopped with just the United States. They have also performed at the Canterbury and Ely Cathedrals in the United Kingdom in 1986, and in 1988, they joined with the Xavier University choir (Ohio) for a two-week tour of West Germany.

And what does the future hold for the Singers? Coming up in May, they will be singing at Bruton Parish Church, in Historic Williamsburg VA., and at The Cathedral of Mary Our Queen in Baltimore. March 17 will find them performing with the UNCW

Brass Ensemble in Kenan Auditorium, and on April 17, they will be performing the German Requiem by Johannes Brahms.

In March 1990, the group will yet again leave the States for a tour in Europe. The group will be based in London, with day trips out to nearby cities for performances.

Dr. Hickman wishes to extend an invitation to everyone who is interested in singing on this tour, or just interested in travel in general. The more, the merrier! (Also, the more, the cheaper the group rate!) As a member of the Chamber Singers, I have enjoyed the challenge of new, difficult music, and the joy of performing with a well-organized group. The UNCW choral program, is seeking fine singers, who have a genuine love for making music. If this description fits you, come and audition at the beginning of next semester. It's an experience that you'll never forget!

Pell Grants Will Become Drug Free

(CPS) -- In a move some student advocates are calling reminiscent of "1984's" Big Brother, the federal government said Feb. 3 it would start asking students who get Pell Grants to prove they don't use illicit drugs.

The measure was published in the Federal register, the list of regulations and rules the government produces to enforce federal laws. The drug rule, which will automatically go into effect if it's not formally challenged within 90 days, was created to implement the Drug-Free Work Place Act of 1988. It asks that all federal grant recipients like weapons manufacturers, highway builders and apparently even students work in "drug-free" environments.

Applying it to students, said Sheldon Steinbach of the American Council on Education, the campus presidents' lobbying group in Washington, D.C., was a "strained interpretation (of the law) that strikes me as being beyond the pale of what was intended."

The U.S. Dept. Education, which issued the rule, disagrees. Somehow, students will have to swear they're not drug abusers.

"We're deciding if students will have to sign a separate form or just check a box on the grant application form," said department spokesman Jim Bradshaw. "But they will have to certify they are drug-free and not using the funds for drug-related activities."

If students lie on the form, Bradshaw said, they could lose their grants.

Still, no one knows how to determine if they are lying.

"We don't have the resources to check on every student," Bradshaw admitted.

"We'll base our information on tips that students have gotten involved in drugs or on newspaper articles about drug activities," Bradshaw said.

Past convictions for drug possession or sales shouldn't affect a student's Pell Grant application, Bradshaw said, but it is an issue the Education Department is considering.

"If the money is going to be used for drugs, then it's better if they hand it to someone who would make good use of it," said a Pell Grant recipient at San Diego City College, who asked that her name not be used.

"It's great," she said.

But Kevin Harris, organizing director of the United States Student Association in Washington, D.C., called the regulations "an invasion of the personal right to privacy," and a poor signal for the new Bush administration to send to students.

"I think you'll hear a large outcry from students in opposition to this regulation," Harris predicted. "It's another signal of Big Brother looking down on the student population. They want to blame youth for the drug problem. It's crazy."

In fact, students are not the only ones being attacked in the war on drugs. In early January, Florida Gov. Bob Martinez announced that, starting in August, all new state employees -- including faculty members, administrators, staffers and student workers at State University System of Florida campuses -- would have to pass drug tests before being hired.

MIT Keeps "Smoot" Marks

(CPS) -- Officials have agreed to preserve a 30-year-old masterpiece of fraternity prankdom, the Smoot marks, when they renovate the Harvard Bridge in Cambridge, Mass.

Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity brothers at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology made community service history back in October, 1958, when they measured the bridge by using the 5-foot-7 frame of pledge Oliver Reed Smoot Jr. as a yardstick.

The bridge was found to be precisely 364.4 Smoots and one ear long.

Ever since, people crossing the Charles River over the Massachusetts Avenue bridge have been able to measure their progress in 10-Smoot intervals painted on the sidewalk. The fraternity has repainted the marks twice a year.

New construction, however, was erasing the marks.

But Metropolitan District Commission officials said Feb. 7 that, though they normally frown on defacing public property, they'll help ensure the Smoots will stay.

Just how they will be preserved, however, is still under discussion. Possibilities include official Smoot-length bronze bars or a Smoot-long section of the original painted concrete that would be embedded in the new bridge. Fraternity members also vow to continue the tradition, saying they have carefully measured the Smoot-length and will repaint the bridge.

Last spring some students proposed re-Smooting the bridge using Smoot's son, Stephen R. Smoot, a junior at MIT. But fraternity members demurred because the son is four inches taller than his dad.

Applications Rates Drop In Top Colleges

(CPS) -- The number of high school seniors applying to top colleges around the nation is down for the first time in years, most likely because of a dwindling number of high school graduates and increasing college costs, admissions officers say.

"Since this is happening to everyone, the best guess is that it's demographics," said Michael Behnke, admissions director of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where applications are down 10 percent from a year ago.

But some suspect that students and their families may be reacting to tuition increases that have consistently exceeded the nation's inflation rate throughout the 1980s.

"I think there's a great possibility that tuitions are a part of it," said Linda Davis Taylor, admissions director of Amherst College, where applications are off by 4 percent from last year.

"I question whether price is a real issue," argued David Merkwowitz of the American Council on Education. "It hasn't affected them before."

The number of high school seniors has dropped steadily from 3 million in 1980 to 2.76 million in 1988, and is expected to drop to 2.44 million by 1992.

An unexpected increase in the ranks of older students and higher percentages of high school students attending college helped offset and expected drop in college enrollment, however. To the surprise of many, college enrollments grew from 12.1 million in 1980 to 12.5 million this year.

Some college officials believe the drop in applications from next fall's freshman class is the first sign the long-expected decline in enrollment is about to begin.

Harvard University spokesman Peter Costa estimates a 5 to 10 percent drop in applications, the first such decline in at least 20 years. Brown University and other Ivy League schools report similar declines.

Stanford University's fall applications have decreased 6 percent, and the number of applications sent to the University of California-Berkeley also has fallen.

"I consider this a yellow light. We all kind of anticipated it," said Bradley Quin, admissions director at Lafayette College in Pennsylvania, where applications are down 5 percent. "I don't mean to imply that we're not concerned. This is a competitive business, and it's going to make it that much harder to increase the quality of our classes."

"I wouldn't predict any plummeting of college enrollments," countered Merkwowitz. "And I certainly wouldn't believe those schools (Ivys and other academically rigorous and expensive colleges) will suffer one bit."

"We're talking about a small margin of change. Elite institutions will not be affected by this because they receive far more applications than the number of students they admit," he added.

If enrollments do fall in the future, Merkwowitz said less selective schools will feel the brunt of it. "The elite schools will have no problem with enrollment."

Some officials say students also may be cutting down on the number of schools they apply to following a decade in which multiple applications increased sharply.

SAT's Out In New York

(CPS) -- A federal judge ruled Feb. 3 that New York state could not use Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores as the sole criterion for awarding scholarships to students.

Some students had argued that using scores from the SAT -- which critics contend are biased in favor of white males -- to award scholarships effectively eliminated many women and minority men from getting grants.

"It's really a very important, precedent-setting case," said Isabelle Katz Pinzler, director of the Women's Rights Project for the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and the students' lead attorneys.

"It's really not fair to anybody to give a scholarship based on a three-hour test given on a Saturday afternoon rather than (testing it) on four years of high school."

U.S. District Judge John Walker said it was apparently the first case in which female students sought to use federal civil rights statutes to challenge a state's reliance on standardized tests.

"The evidence is clear that females score significantly below males on the SAT while they perform equally or slightly better than males in high school," Walker wrote in his decision.

The judge said the state Education Department and its commissioner, Thomas Sobol, both named in the suit, rely solely upon the SAT in awarding Regents and Empire scholarships. He said the practice "deprives young women of the opportunity to compete equally for these prestigious scholarships."

Walker ordered the state to change its method of awarding the scholarships.

State officials had no comment on the ruling.

"I think it will have limited application," said Stanford vonMayrhauser, general counsel for the Educational Testing Service, the creator of the SAT. "Critics of the SAT will have false comfort if they think the test is doomed."

New York and Massachusetts are the only states that give state scholarships based solely on SAT performances.

The suit was filed by the ACLU on behalf of the New York chapter of the National Organization for Women, the Girls Club of America and 10 female students.

Marxist Sues For Tenure At VCU

(CPS) -- A Virginia Commonwealth University faculty member has sued the school, claiming she was denied tenure because she is a Marxist.

Susan F. Feiner, an assistant professor of economics and the only Marxist in her department, contends the decision to deny her tenure stems from an anti-Marxist bias among her colleagues. She claims her scholarly work, which is based on Marxist thought, had been downgraded because most of it was published in journals not considered "mainstream."

In her lawsuit, Feiner claimed her rights to academic freedom and to a fair tenure review had been violated.

Thomas Poe, a university spokesman, said Feiner was denied tenure because her research "did not measure up to the standards that they consider acceptable for a tenured individual."

"All I can say is that the university has eight or nine levels of review to keep everyone and the process fair," said economics department Chairman George Hoffer, one of the defendants named in the suit.

Louisville Softens Smoking Policy

(CPS) -- Bucking a national trend, the University of Louisville has softened its proposed anti-smoking rules, bowing to threats of funding cuts from legislators in a state where tobacco is a $2 billion industry.

University President Donald Swain said Feb. 7 that the new policy, supposed to take effect March 1, will not include a provision that all "irreconcilable" conflicts between smokers and nonsmokers be resolved in favor of nonsmokers.

Some Kentucky legislators contended the policy was unfair to smokers and threatened to decrease state funding to the university if the new rules were implemented.

"We've tried to address all concerns, including those of the legislators," Swain said.

"There was concern that smokers be treated with some balance. We were concerned that the previous policy was a little one-sided."

Swain said the revised policy directs department heads to settle conflicts with employees.

The revised smoking policy also doesn't include previous bans on smoking in open work areas, directing instead that such areas be separated into smoking and non-smoking sections or be designated one or the other after discussions with employees.

"If it's fair to smokers, that's what we want to look at," said state Rep. Donnie Gedling, chairman of the legislature's Tobacco Task Force and an outspoken opponent of the university's earlier proposal.

Another key legislator, House Agriculture Committee Chairman Clay Crupper, said any smoking policy was inappropriate for a public institution in a tobacco-growing state. "I didn't think they needed any regulation," he said.

Kentucky had the nation's highest smoking-related death rate in 1985, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control reported in November.

Louisville's policy revision is the exception to a growing trend, however. Scores of colleges and universities across the United States have restricted smoking in recent years, and some have even banned smoking completely from campus buildings. The policies generally have grown even more restrictive since the start of the 1988-89 school year.

Washington's Big Band Community College, Penn State, Sanford, Tulane and Mankato State universities and the universities of Texas, Illinois, Colorado, Nebraska, North Dakota and the University of North Carolina at Wilmington are among the institutions that have restricted on-campus smoking.

Gay Program Stopped At Loyola

(CPS) -- Students at Loyola University of New Orleans will not be able to hear a program about gay men put on by a well-known professor because the Catholic Church, which runs Loyola, condemns homosexuality.

And any speakers who visit the campus in the future to talk about the subject will be preceded or succeeded by someone offering an "opposing view," student government faculty advisor Robert Hepler has ruled.

The controversy arose when a university employee asked student President Will Wang to invite someone -- it turned out to be Prof. E. Martin Duberman, a widely published author of scholarly books and articles -- to speak on campus about gay issues.

Wang, however, said he couldn't extend an invitation for Duberman to speak because student government policy dictates speakers who oppose church teachings must be balanced by speakers who support Catholic doctrine, either in a debate format or in a separate presentation.

"We're not against having a speaker on this topic," said Colin Potts, vice president of the Loyola Union. "But we need lead time, we need to see who fits within our budget. Speakers are selected a semester in advance."

"Homosexuality is against Catholic doctrine," Potts explained. "We need both sides of an issue like that for a balanced presentation."

"When we present a controversial subject, it is my duty to inform other groups (who might disagree) like the Jesuits," said faculty advisor Hepler. "I would notify them so they can present their side and leave it at that."

A year ago, the student government presented a program on pornography as a debate before a standing-room-only crowd, Potts said.

"While we hadn't planned on this kind of presentation (on homosexuality), it's not an idea to be turned away. But the request has to be made through the (Ideas and Issues) committee head," said Potts.

Any other campus group can bring a speaker to the school, Potts said, but the student government arranges most of the arts, film and music presentations on campus.

The Loyola Union has received no letters or calls criticizing its actions, said Potts. "There have been some letters in the (student) paper in favor of the policy. It's not that big a deal on campus. No one's mad."

Worried? Take A Realistic Look

It's one o'clock in the morning and outside the office windows can only be heard the consistent sputtering of Domino's drivers delivering late night hunger gratification to those night hawks who have the time and money to afford such a luxury.

As I watch those drivers go by I wonder how many people at that moment haven't the financial assets to purchase a pizza much less a phone to order it on.

Today I looked outside the same office window and saw multitudes of students gossiping about the place to be tonight, where the legs are, where the girls are, where the band is. I heard several whose main goal was to find that keg or that party.

Then I wondered about those other people whose only goal in life is to make it to the next billing period or those families who wonder if their son and daughter could have been saved from dying in an alcohol or drug related accident.

When I look outside and see the gorgeous BMW's (I always wonder why people who drive cars that cost more than a college tuition are in college anyway), or nice new 1989 cars, I wonder why people would buy something that depreciates $2000 as soon as they drive it off the lot. Then I ask myself if these people are grateful for what they have or if their main concern is who they can impress or outrun; I know I used to think that way.

One of my friends used to be obsessed with his car. He had to have the right stereo, the right rims, the right transmission. He had put two good years of his life into this thing, (that's what it is, after all, a thing) and he wrecked it. Here was this car he'd put thousands into and in the end it was nothing more than a heap of junk. The most ironic aspect of the entire affair was that although he had indeed trashed the car, he still had car payments and stereo payments to meet.

People seem to be blind living in their own little world that exists without problems and worries unless they are personal problems and worries. Just last week I blew the engine in my car. My luck was running low and it just so happened that no one in town could work on a rotary engine except for some foreign car specialist. Yet during this entire episode I found myself dwelling on the fact that my personal little world was at stake. In reality there were many people who had much more to worry about than I did.

I happened to see a rather serious accident on Market Street just after having my car towed in and realized that whomever was involved had some serious problems ahead of them.

There seems to be a rather large group of self-centered people now who don't worry about the problems that face society today. Maybe if they did, those problems wouldn't exist. The fact remains that the problems do exist and this isn't a sermon on what you should be doing about them. This is simply a request.

If you have the essentials of food, clothing, and a bed to sleep in, just reflect for a moment on the fact that some people don't. You don't have to dwell on it, but it is true that almost 100% of the people that go to school here have those essentials.

This University is in effect a Utopian society without homelessness, poverty stricken derelicts walking about asking for food and work. We have a campus away from the problems of the modern world in which our only connection with them is what we either read about or see on television.

There is validity in a quote I once read: "I used to complain about not having shoes until I met a man without feet."

Nations Threats to Iran Appropriate

It's great that so many of the world's nations have decided the issue with Satanic Verses has gone far enough. Known for extremist policies, Iran finally pushed a delicate situation too far, with results that portend economic and diplomatic disaster.

Britain made her statement to the Moslems and the Ayatollah very strongly with her call for withdrawal of top diplomats in Tehran. Bless them that they even hinted at asking the Iranian charge d'affaires to leave London.

Thank God that America is not the only country willing to go out on a limb for freedom of speech. If Salman Rushdie had a dream about Mohammed, he has every right to say what he dreamt.

But as America and the 12 European community nations have said, no one has the right to issue a death warrant to someone for a dream. And the most ironic part of all is that if they had never made a fuss about it, no one would have rushed out to buy the book.

School Neglecting Obligations to Residents

It's crazy that the school is not willing to take greater responsibility for preserving the rights of paying students. Last week, when those men were found in the Graham Hall bathrooms (see the story, page one) someone should have at least circulated a memo regarding the incident to the residents, so they would know to lock their doors in order to prevent the unwanted appearance of strangers.

Remember when they found those Marines in Belk last year? Everyone freaked out and bodily removed from the them, after warning all the girls and putting it in the paper.

Why is not the same thing happening now? It seems this is more serious, even, for student's possessions were being stolen. Is it because the students involved were male, and they are supposed to defend themselves? Imagine walking into your bathroom and having two men make obscene gestures at you when you ask them if they are almost done.

The administration seems willing to blame the students for the lack of action, and that's not fair. Who is going to be willing to stare at two naked, unfriendly adult men long enough to give an accurate description?

It is certainly the administration's responsibility to notify residents if there is any kind of threat to the security of themselves and their possessions. In the absence of such a warning, it is fair for residents to assume there is no added threat. Yes, students should be responsible for locking their doors, but even if they don't, it does not make it right for the school to be so laid-back in the apprehension of the intruders or prevention of their intrusion in the first place.

New Employee Not Impressed With Column

I am a new employee at UNCW and today I had my first chance to read the SEAHAWK. Interesting. A prime example of a strange use of Freedom of the Press.

I am referring to the "column" contributed by Rick Cairns, his attempt to "enlighten" all of us poor souls who are ignorant concerning phobias. I fail to see any humor at all in what he wrote, it seemed to be written only to fill space in your paper and lacked any journalistic value. I was frankly disgusted by his attempt to be funny.

On the front page was an article about high school students and the parents coming for Visitation Day. If I were a parent coming here to visit, thinking it might be a good place for my child to get an education, and I happened to see Rick Cairns' article I would have serious second thoughts about the quality of education offered. I realize the SEAHAWK is a newspaper for the students, and different people have different ideas about what is funny, but surely by the time the average person reaches college their sense of humor has matured to some degree beyond the bathroom jokes.

Relationships, Priorities and Balance

I believe that one of the deepest needs of our human experience is the need for a significant other person in our lives. In most cases that need is acted out in our search for a relationship that can culminate in marriage. Pushing from the other direction, is the awareness of how many marriages are winding up in divorce. As a matter of fact, many young people are growing up as children of divorce and have no good model for a successful marriage relationship. These factors leave a lot of young people with a good deal of fearfulness about marriage.

When our deep human need for long term intimacy intersects with our society bred fear of failure, the result is yet another element of stress in our lives and the emergence of a deeply significant question, "how can I know that my marriage will work?" There is no simple answer to that. It is one of the questions that we must live into as I described last week. Yet there is one element that I want to point out as having incredible significance. It is fidelity, faithfulness between partners at what ever level of relationship they have. Fidelity is usually spoken of in terms of our sexuality. The commandment says, "Thou shall not commit adultery." To my way of thinking, fidelity includes more than our sexuality.

When you get right down to the core of living, we have two elements available to us: Time and our energy. To have any kind of relationship with another person demands that we spend time and invest our energy with that person. The more our relationship develops, the more time and energy are spent. If a relationship evolves to the point where two persons become really significant for each other, they will find themselves needing and wanting to spend a good percentage of their time and energy with each other. For me to have a successful family life demands that I spend 35 or 40% of my time and energy with my family. They need and deserve that kind of investment from me. I need and want it too. To take away any significant percentage of the time and energy required to make the relationship work is to be unfaithful, in a sense, to commit adultery.

Any relationship that is going to be meaningful demands a large investment of ourselves. If we divert time and energy needed to sustain that relationship in to some other channel, even into our professional lives, then we must face the possibility that we are being unfaithful. Working 60-80 hours a week means that a man is simply not available to nourish his relationship with his spouse and/or family. His work can become his mistress.

Fidelity, an indispensable quality of a lasting relationship, calls for the constant reinvestment of the time and energy needed to sustain our beloved. Without such constant nourishment, no relationship can survive.

Trying To Break The Sports Addiction

Ever since my Dad first made me watch the Browns and Indians when I was knee-high to a cockroach, I've been addicted. After the disappointment of the '88 season, I've been trying to break the addiction. I'm trying to understand the attraction of sports--what makes me so addicted to it?

I'm attempting to look objectively at pro sports, and boy, they sure seem silly. The fact that grown men are getting paid millions to play a game is ridiculous enough, if you think about it.

Let's look at football first. Eleven men line up against another and try an move a oblong-shaped ball over a line--or kick it through posts. These men wear helmets and pads over every part of their body. They are already huge; they don't need padding. The object of the game sounds like a lot of fun, but rules and penalties put a damper on it.

I would like to see these tough guys on the "gridiron" without rules or padding. Just get the ball over the goal--at any cost. No sissy quarterbacks, no tightends--just tough guys struggling with the ball. Hey, that sounds like rugby.

To hell with the statistics, too. I don't want to hear about sacks or half-sacks. (Does half a sack mean the quarterback didn't break a bone?) I love that new stat--hurries. I can hear the quarterback, "I had to throw it--those big thavages were hurrying me." I find it strange that the guys that do the most scoring are little Dweebs who kick the ball. Most of them don't even know what's going on because they're from countries where mortar-dodging is the national sport. You can hear them on the sideline bragging, "I kick touchdown--No?"

Speaking of wimps--how about baseball? They don't wear pads and they aren't usually real big, but they don't touch each other either. They "tag" each other. They get to play on a "diamond," the object of baseball is to get more men around the bases to "home" than the other guys. Now, isn't that special?

A player attempts to hit a little white ball with a stick and not have anyone catch it. If he is successful a third of the time--he is considered to be great and can sell underarm deodorant and underwear. Where else is succeeding a third of the time considered to be superior? If a player can prevent the batters from getting many hits he is also eligible for millions of dollars and to sell underthings.

Now, baseball is where they need "hurries." A batter can stand at home and scratch his gonads forever. They are also allowed to foul to the ball off, a million times. This is where we need sacks. There should be a rule that if a batter fouls four pitches--the catcher can knock the hell out of him. They may add some interest to the 800 game season. You figure with a season that long, losing can't be that big of a deal. They act sad for the camera, but stumble over each other to get the hell out of the stadium for a cold brew or a fine line.

This brings me to the round ball. Now, this is a tough sport. These are huge men wearing shorts and knocking each other all over the "court." It's just five on five and they can sweat with the best of them. Too bad there are so many personal fouls. A guy can refrain from wearing deodorant and drip all over an opponents face--and this isn't a personal foul. But touch him on the wrist--instant foul.

Basketball also has slam dunks, field goals, dribbles, double dribbles, traveling, free throws and technical fouls. Someone has to be really bad to receive a technical foul. I think saying "F" word constitutes a technical foul. Then the opposing team is awarded one free throw.WOW.

After six hundred games or so, every team goes to the playoffs, except Charlotte and Miami. After two more months, we finally see the finals, and it's usually LA or Boston, or both.

Now that I put all of these sports into another perspective and realize that I'm a complete Dork to be cheering for grown men named "Icey," Boomer, Bubby, Oil Can, Spitz, Sparky, Spud, Manute and Muggsy, who make more money than I ever will--I can sit out next season. (How's that for a sentence?) After the Cavaliers are finished for the season, I'll start my personal boycott.

1989 TAX INFO. FOR STUDENTS

Overdue Refunds Can Be Traced

Most students filing tax returns are expecting refunds. If a student hasn't received an expected refund within eight weeks after the return was filed, there is a way to trace that refund. The first step, according to the Internal Revenue Service, is to contact the IRS.

A special automated refund inquiry system, Tele-Tax, is available by calling toll-free, 1-800-554-4477, and following the recorded instructions. The student should have a copy of his or her tax return available when calling, in order to provide the social security number, filing status and exact amount of refund shown on the return. If the student contacts Tele-Tax and finds that a check was in fact issued but not received, he or she should then call toll-free, 1-800-424-1040, for assistance in tracking and reissuing the refund.

There are several reasons why a check may not have been received. For example, the return may have been incomplete or unsigned. Such returns are held up in processing while the IRS contacts the taxpayers for more complete or accurate information. Students should double-check the return and be sure that it is signed before mailing it. Other tax returns never reach the service center for processing—either the address is incorrect or proper postage has not been added to the envelope. Also, if the specially designed peel-off label is not used, and the taxpayer's identification or address information is illegible, the return can not be processed, and the refund will be delayed.

For additional free information on Tele-Tax, students may obtain Publication 910, "Guide to Free Tax Services," or the Tele-Tax brochure, Publication 1163, by calling toll-free, 1-800-424-3676.

Rounding Off May Limit Mistakes

You may reduce the chance of making arithmetic errors on your tax return by rounding off amounts to the nearest dollar, the Internal Revenue Service says.

When you round off one dollar item, however, you must consistently round off all amounts. Amounts under 50 cents should be dropped. For example, $19.21 becomes $19. Amounts from 50 cents to 99 cents should be increased to the next higher dollar, so $19.50 becomes $20. If you do round off, do so for all amounts. However, if you have to add two or more amounts together to figure the total to enter on a line, include cents when adding the amounts and only round off the total. By not having to worry about decimal points, you may find you make fewer math errors that could delay your refund.

Filing Requirement

Students who qualify to be claimed as a dependent on another's tax return generally must file a return if their gross income exceeds their allowable standard deduction or if they had unearned income and their total income exceeds $500.

Prizes and Awards

If you win a prize in a drawing, contest, TV or radio program or other event, you must include it in your income. Also, prizes awarded for past accomplishments in religious, charitable, scientific, artistic, educational, literary, or civic fields are usually included in income. For details, see Publication 525, "Taxable and Nontaxable Income."

Exemption from Withholding

Students who had no tax liability for 1988 and who expect to owe no tax for 1989 may qualify to be exempt from income tax withholding during 1989. See Form W-4 instructions for more details.

Processing Pipeline

Returns are delivered to the Regional Service Centers.

Envelopes are opened and counted.

Returns are sorted by type of return.

Tax returns and accompanying checks are compared.

Returns are edited and coded for computer processing.

Tax return information is placed on magnetic tape for computer processing.

IRS computers check returns for mathematical accuracy.

Tapes are sent to the National Computer Center for Account Posting and Settlement.

Tapes of refunds are sent to the Treasury Department Disbursing Center for issuance of checks directly to taxpayers. Tapes of balances due are sent back to the service centers for the generation of collection notices directly to taxpayers.

Tips for Careful Refunds

To those expecting a tax refund this year, the Internal Revenue Service says an error-free return speeds processing time. A quick check for accuracy can help avoid mistakes; and a carefully prepared, easy-to-read return can be processed faster.

Once the return is completed, the IRS suggests consulting the following check list:

- Have you attached all your Forms W-2, "Wage and Tax Statements"?
- Have you attached all the supporting schedules to your Form 1040?
- Are your name and social security number on each schedule?
- Are the names and social security numbers of dependents five years or older on your return?
- Is your arithmetic correct?

- Are all of your entries on the proper lines?
- If you rounded off your numbers, did you round off consistently?
- Is your handwriting legible?
- When you used the Tax Table, did you follow the line across to the correct column for your filing status?
- Did you sign and date your return? Remember, if it's a joint return, your spouse must sign too.
- Did you use the peel-off label, and is the information on the label correct?
- Have you made necessary corrections right on the peel-off label?
- Did you make a copy of your return for your records?
- Did you put the correct postage on the pre-addressed envelope? If the return has several attachments, additional postage may be required.

Double-Check — Increase Accuracy

Many students with summer or part-time jobs can not claim exemption from federal income tax withholding, according to the Internal Revenue Service.

Because of changes made by the Tax Reform Act of 1986, anyone who may be claimed as a dependent on another person's return is not entitled to a personal exemption on his or her own return. Therefore, many students who can be claimed as dependents on their parents' or another person's tax return cannot claim exemption from withholding for 1989, especially if they have investment income, such as interest on savings accounts.

Generally, students not exempt from withholding should claim one withholding allowance if they have only one job at a time. Or, if they need or want more tax withheld, they should claim zero allowances. See the Form W-4 instructions for more details.

Students whose wages for the year are very low and who have no investment income generally will be exempt from withholding.

Students can claim exemption from tax withholding on their Form W-4, "Employee's Withholding Allowance Certificate," only if last year they had to pay no federal income tax and this year they expect to have to pay no federal income tax, the IRS said. If exempt status is claimed, it remains in effect until February 15 of the next year. See the Form W-4 instructions for more details.

Form W-4 is available from employers or from IRS by calling 1-800-424-3676.

"Understanding Taxes" Goal: Make Students' Taxes Less Taxing

High school students across the United States are finding that "taxes can be less taxing." They're doing this by learning the basics of taxes and the U.S. tax system, using some of the most popular technology—videos and computer software, Internal Revenue Service says.

The IRS, through the "Understanding Taxes" Program, provides high schools with a modular package of tax education materials developed to meet the needs of students in social studies, history, civics, government, economics, business education and vocational education courses. The new resource package, developed in 1988, includes:

- nine 15-minute videos on a VHS cassette;
- software that "walks" students through completion of W-2, W-4 and 1040EZ tax forms;
- an overview booklet; and
- detailed, practical lesson plans with transparencies and duplicating masters.

Because the materials are not copyrighted, teachers can make as many copies as their students need.

The program was developed and approved by the Joint Council on Economic Education, the IRS, the Agency for Instructional Technology, and representatives from every state education and economic education agency.

For more information, interested individuals can contact the IRS Taxpayer Education Coordinator at their local IRS office or call 1-800-424-1040.

File Early

If you file your tax return early, you'll be more relaxed and less likely to make errors. If you've got a refund coming, you'll probably get it faster.

Electronic Filing — A New Way to File

Taxpayers in most areas of the country may file their tax returns electronically rather than on paper forms if they are expecting a refund, the Internal Revenue Service says.

Began in 1986 as a pilot test program in three states, electronic filing has expanded to include 36 states for 1989. According to the IRS, over 500,000 returns were filed electronically from 16 districts in 1988. In 1990, the system will expand to provide electronic filing to all 50 states.

Electronic filing allows qualified tax preparation firms to file clients' tax returns with the IRS over telephone lines directly into IRS computers. The firms do not have to prepare the returns in order to transmit them.

Electronic filing, while eliminating most of the manual processing of traditional paper returns, improves accuracy; provides the tax preparer with an acknowledgment the returns have been received, usually within 48 hours; and cuts the time to issue a refund check by as much as three weeks, according to the IRS.

Taxpayers who file their returns electronically also have the option of having their refunds deposited directly into their checking or savings accounts by direct deposit.

The IRS does not charge a fee for electronic filing. However, some tax preparation firms do charge to transmit a return electronically. If a tax preparation firm charges a fee, it must be the same for all clients.

A list of participating local preparers may be obtained by calling the IRS toll-free at 1-800-424-1040 and asking for the Electronic Filing Coordinator.

Electronic Filing is Now Available in 36 States

Summer Job — Think Taxes

If you are going to get a job this summer, the Internal Revenue Service urges you to take a few minutes to think about taxes.

There are many factors which can affect your taxes for the year. Can you be claimed as a dependent by someone else? If you can, whether or not someone else actually claims you, you will not be able to claim your personal exemption when you file your tax return.

Do you have investment income, such as interest on savings accounts? If you can be claimed as a dependent by someone else, that investment income will probably be taxed if your total income is over $500. You will be able to claim a standard deduction only against your earned income, such as wages.

Do you receive a scholarship or fellowship grant, or will you receive such a grant by the end of the year? A part of that grant may have to be included on your tax return.

Each of these factors should be considered when you fill out your Form W-4, "Employee's Withholding Allowance Certificate," for your summer job. If that job is the only income you have for the year, you may qualify to be exempt from income tax withholding. But, if you do have investment income, or a taxable scholarship or fellowship, you will need to consider those other incomes. How much income tax you need to have withheld so you will not owe extra taxes at the end of the year will depend on total income.

Form W-4 is available from employers or from IRS by calling 1-800-424-3676.

Allocated Tips May Be Income

Employees to whom tips are allocated may need to report the allocated tips as income on their income tax returns, according to the Internal Revenue Service.

Large food and beverage establishments, where tipping is customary, are required to report allocated tips to their tipped employees and to the IRS.

To determine if tip allocation is necessary, employers compare the total tips reported by employees to 8 percent of the establishment's total food and beverage sales. (In some cases, this comparison percentage could be less than 8 percent.) If the reported tips are less than the 8 percent figure, the employer must allocate the difference to the tipped employees. The employer must also report this allocated amount to the IRS. Also, the employees may have to include the allocated amount in income.

Tip allocations are made only to employees who do not report tips equal to or about the applicable percentage and who receive tips directly from customers unless there is an agreement that the tips be allocated among all tipped employees.

Employees who earn $20 or more a month in tips while working for one employer must report the total amount of these tips each month to their employer by the 10th day of the following month. Some employers may require these written reports more than once a month.

The monthly tip report must contain the employee's name, address and social security number. The employer's name and address, the period covered and the total amount of tips must also be in the report, which must be signed and dated by the employee. Keeping daily tip records will make preparing the monthly report easier, according to the IRS.

Employees should withhold income and social security or railroad retirement tax only on the tips reported by the employees, not on allocated amounts. The amount employees must include on their tax returns may be more or less than the allocated amount. However, the IRS may use the employer's annual report to determine that a tipped employee received a larger amount of tip income than reflected by the tip allocation.

Employees must report all tip income on their tax returns, even if they are not required to report tips to their employers. Failure to do so could result in a penalty.

Free IRS forms are available for maintaining a daily tip record and preparing monthly reports. Call toll-free, 1-800-424-3676, and ask for Publication 1244, which contains "Employee's Daily Record of Tips (Form 4070-A) and Employer's Report of Tips to Employer (Form 4070)," and Publication 531, "Reporting Income from Tips," which has detailed information on tips.

Anti-Apartheid Candlelight Vigil Held

BRUCE FOLEY
STAFF WRITER

In remembrance of the living and deceased that have fought the South African policy of apartheid, the Black Student Union held a candlelight vigil last Monday night.

Delthea Simmons, president of the Black Student Union, opened the Vigil with a stirring rendition of Billie Holiday's "Strange Fruit," a famous blues ballad encompassing the struggles and injustices that black people have faced throughout history. A brief analysis of the South African issue was presented, followed by a prayer and a moment of silence for the victims of apartheid.

The congregation that met on the Union's front lawn was a modest representation of the campus population, the majority being members of the Black Student Union. The question arises: are students aware of the crimes against humanity that are committed through the Botha regime? Judy Brimage, a junior at UNCW, feels that "most students have heard of apartheid, yet they probably don't know what exactly it represents and to what extent it covers."

Delthea Simmons expressed a lack of concern on the part of UNCW students. "For the most part, I don't think most students give a damn about the concerns of South Africa," she said. "Most students walk around campus and their biggest concern is their resume or their GPA."

The Vigil was important because it reflected the students' sentiment regarding foreign concerns. "We wanted to let people know that we are aware of what's going on in South Africa, and we are sympathetic," said Simmons.

The innocent victims and martyrs who have died as a result of the policies in South Africa were not forgotten during the Vigil.

"There are a lot of famous people that could be remembered, Steven Biko, Nelson Mandela, but mostly we want to remember the nameless, the faceless, the children who were shot down in schoolyards, the children who no longer have parents," said Simmons.

She continued "As long as we remember these martyrs and why they died, they will live on."

Many students may feel that we should first be concerned with the problems that plague our own country, for problems involving foreign countries are not our primary issues. Kishi Wright, a junior at UNCW, said that "anywhere people are being treated inhuman, we should be concerned, regardless of whether they are black or white."

"We cannot put aside foreign problems because, whether or not we are talking about South Africa or South Georgia, it is still the same thing," said Simmons.

Delthea also criticizes America's passive role regarding South Africa. "I see too often how domestic policy and foreign policy reflect each other. If America does not take an active role concerning South Africa and the injustices done to the black people, what does this say for our own people?"

Dr. Matthew T. Kambule, professor of mathematics here at UNCW, experienced the hard oppressiveness of apartheid firsthand while living under the shadow of South Africa.

Blacks are not allowed to become citizens of South Africa. They are restricted to reservations which are called "homelands." In order to leave the "homelands" and enter white cities, a black person must have a passbook enabling them to work within the city limits. Those who are considered "illegal residents" are arrested and often sold to white farmers as cheap labor for an extended period of time.

Dr. Kambule recounted the episode where he was arrested for a "supposed" passbook violation. When asking the officer what the charge was, Kambule was told "I can make it up, it doesn't matter." Fortunately, one of Kambule's co-workers witnessed the incident, and reported it to the company he was working for. They sent lawyers to the jail and, with the testimony of Kambule's co-worker, he was freed.

"There were countless numbers who were arrested that day, and were not as fortunate as I was."

Kambule praises the American people for their role in fighting apartheid, but criticizes the American government's passive stance.

Student concern on campus is not unlike the overall American attitude, one of uninvolved and indifference towards the atrocities committed by the South African government.

Delthea reflected on the policy of American intervention, saying "I think people have a basic sense of what is right and what is wrong, and it's wrong to treat people like chattel. I would like to see the people of South Africa to someday have the tools to set up their own government, and not for us to go in and establish another Nicaragua."

Finance

amount of money that clubs must raise in order to get funded.

"We only desire to supplement clubs, not support them," says Wolfson. The "Minimum Revenue Requirement (M.R.R.)" exists in order to make clubs raise a percentage of the money that SGA allocates to them.

For example; a club has asked the SGA for $1000. To receive that $1000, the club must presently raise 20% ($200) on its own in order to receive that $1000. The new legislation calls for a 5% increase in the M.R.R., making the new figure 25%.

"It should not be too hard for the club(s) to raise this extra 5%. We just want the club to work hard for it's goal," said Barnhill. "We do not wish to be a [handout service]."

The President of the College Democrats just happens to be Lee Barnhill. He does not seem to be disappointed that the legislation he helped create will also strip his organization of funds.

"I just think that there are students who are angry that political and religious organizations are funded.

Especially since these special interest groups do not better the student body, but rather those with the same views as the ideology of these clubs," said Barnhill.

Predictably, some club presidents are not too happy with the new legislation.

Cheryl Dimwiddle, President of the MBA graduate association, commented, "I would be very disappointed if this legislation passes. Not so much for our club, but for the other organizations on campus."

The MBA association has been recently awarded a "seed" account of $200. Since this organization is an academic club, it is very likely that it will not receive more than $500 by the SGA should the legislation pass.

"We really do not need all that much money, but since we are a graduate students club, we really do not have the time to be involved in large scale fund raising events," said Dimwiddle.

Unfortunately, not other leaders of SGA funded clubs were available for comment, but a wide range of reactions will surely be heard from those who will be affected by the legislation.

Intruders

most crimes could be curtailed. Barbour acknowledged that the University couldn't post 24 hour RA's he feels, however, that there are areas where security could be tightened.

"In instances like this it is hard to catch the culprit," said Captain Billy Dawson, Captain-Coordinator for Police Operations. He stated that the lack of description and vagueness of the report contributed to the problem of finding the two men. Dawson also said that there hadn't been an official report filed; rather, the incident had been "mentioned" him.

No police reports or official memos regarding the incident have been circulated. Police weren't called in time, and currently no follow up is in process.

"I'm all for personal hygiene, but I paid for that shower, and I don't want anyone in it - much less walking off with my soap and shampoo," reiterated Patrick Fowler.

Hewlett

As Speaker of the N.C. House of Representatives and Member of the Board of Trustees of Wilmington College, Hewlett persuaded the Budget Commission of the State Legislature to include aid for the budget of UNCW. This action brought the first state support for the institution.

Hewlett also helped obtain the 650 acres of land that is now the UNCW campus, aided in the formation of plans for the university, and assisted in every legal aspect.

"He had the mark of a real statesman," said Rowell.

Because of his many contributions to UNCW, both as a member of the community and as a member of the UNCW Board of Trustees, Hewlett has been honored in a number of ways.

In 1971 Hewlett was awarded an honorary Doctorate of Law, the first given by the university.

Hewlett was also honored by UNCW in 1979 when Hewlett Residence Hall was named in his honor.

It was through his guidance that Wilmington College became a four year institution and will continue to grow.

Rowell said, "At the time of his death, Addison Hewlett was as proud of UNCW as anything else he had ever done."

Dempsey said that Hewlett was a "down-to-earth and compassionate man, whose greatest attribute to the university was his outstanding leadership skill and his overwhelming personal interest in UNCW."

Whether as a leader, a legislator, or spokesman for the university, Addison Hewlett has made his mark upon, and will always be remembered by the students, faculty, and staff of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington.

We The Mediocre

By Kelly Holsten

I have returned from the worst evening probably ever experienced by any creature claiming to possess anything remotely close to Reasoning skills. If I had any of those skills before last night, they are totally Missing at this hour...

I journeyed to Raleigh to see Dinosaur Jr. at The Brewery, and returned early this morning in a complete fog. The details remain slightly hazy, but unfortunately not quite hazy enough. I remember it all started on the ride up highway 421. My girlfriend was locked into a fiendish discussion with the two passengers in the back seat; it had something to do with the merit of lap belts and head rests in a head-on collision at over 75 mph. Suddenly, the discussion turned to yogurt, Atlanta, flounder, modeling, and the GRE all in a matter of seconds. Who was this person sitting next to me? Who were these people in the back seat? I had no control of the journey, yet I was behind the wheel of this speeding vehicle! Something must have snapped within my skull, because I think I drove over two hours with my jaws locked together in a virtual Death Scowl. I wanted no part of this mission; the Karma had turned inside-out. Unfortunately, this should have been a warning to stop while I was ahead. Yet, once we arrived at The Brewery, I realized this was going to be one of those nights of Pretended Enjoyment that must run its own course; this was a night where the MEANS not only justified the END, they WERE the End. I came to this conclusion after I noticed the line entering The Brewery; it had no beginning or end. It resembled something close to a Mobius Strip. By the time we entered the foyer, I had already experienced courtship, marriage, honeymoon, and divorce with the woman standing next to me. We should have left and taken our chances, because the scene at the door was even more ugly and brutal. The door man refused to accept our guest passes....He wanted MONEY...or Blood. I tried to convince the fine gentleman that I was reviewing this Happening for an established Journal of Fine Arts. He was not amused. After coughing up ever last cent from the collective gathering, we were allowed within.

The opening band had already quit and Dinosaur Jr. was just starting to warm up. The crowd was frothing at the mouth and I was beginning to feel nauseas. I had barely focused my eyes before the band launched into a WALL of noise that somewhat reminded me of one of the songs off their last album, BUG. There was much whining and gnashing of teeth along with flying arms, hair, and spit...and this was the BAND! The guitar player was slumped over what looked like a Fender Jaguar. The tone was raw, ragged, and melodic all at the same time. The bass player flailed on his bass not unlike a rhythm guitarist while the drummer kept furious time with drum sticks that appeared to be no more than a foot long. The band sped through no more than eight songs before coming to a flying stop. I know there were eight songs only because I had them practically memorized note for note. I feel sorry for anyone not familiar with the band, because it probably would have seemed like one continuous song from the depth of 60's HELL. I like this band a lot and they did play with an energy level approaching melt down, but when they finished playing after only 45 minutes, I felt defeated. The crowd milled around wanting more; there were still 30 minutes of drinking time and no way to vent anger. That's when a fellow Wilmingtonian and I headed for the dressing room where the band was holed up. Things turned very ugly after we banged on the door in our best imitation of a police raid. After expressing our displeasure at the early retirement, the band appeared confused. They claimed that this was the normal duration of their performance; I told them to just concentrate on T-shirt sales.

That was about the last thing I remember...for a bouncer the size of N.C. State's Bell Tower escorted me to the parking lot. The last thing I heard, the band was giving away free shirts and beer. I was left alone, dejected, and thoroughly beaten on the concrete in the rain.

Registration for Housing Lottery Upcoming

UNCW students who do not have guaranteed housing and wish to live on campus for the 1989-90 school year must register for the housing lottery. Students may sign up from 7:30 a.m. - 5 p.m., February 27 through March 3, in the housing office located on the first floor of Belk Hall. Students will be notified of the outcome via UNCW post office boxes following spring break. Results will also be posted in the residence halls/apartments, as soon as available.

Closing Events for Black History Month

The following is a list of activities scheduled now through the end of the month in conjunction with Black History Month: Friday, February 24, "Hero" Awards Program at 5:30 p.m. in UU; Saturday, February 25, annual Visitation Day 1-4 p.m. in Trask coliseum and that evening at 7:30 an Awards Banquet will be held at the Coastline Convention Center. Justice Frye will not be on campus tonight as originally planned.

Fill Your Easter Basket in the Bookstore!

The university bookstore has a large selection of plush bunnies, lambs & ducks for your Easter basket needs. A tree decorated with handpainted wooden ornaments is also available. Bookstore hours are 7:45 a.m. - 5 p.m.

Bad Poetry Contest

The 2nd Annual Bad Poetry Contest sponsored by the English Club will be held March 2 (Time and place TBA)

Prizes and gift certificates from area restaurants will be awarded. Everyone, especially faculty, staff, and students, is invited to participate, and a good time is expected to be had by all!

For further information contact Gena Winstead or Anderson Brewer.

Senior Leadership Award

To promote the recognition of outstanding leadership contributions of students at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, a special award has been established. The award is a $200 cash stipend, a high quality plaque, the winner's name listed on a roster plaque to be permanently displayed in the University Union, and special recognition at the Leadership Banquet to be held in April. Names of seniors who meet the following criteria are being solicited:

- A minimum of a 3.0 GPA
- Outstanding leadership on campus and/or in the community
- Graduating in May or summer of 1989
- Any member of the campus community may nominate a qualified student. Self-nominations will be accepted. Nominations are due February 28, 1989. Applications and 3 letters of recommendation will be due March 17, 1989.

For more information, contact The Leadership Center in University Union 212 at 395-3877.

Leadership Workshops

Thurs. Feb 23, 1989 UU 212 4-5:30pm
Self-motivation and motivation of others are at the heart of student leadership and involvement. The new leader needs to understand how goals, risk, stress, attitude, and trust can be essential ingredients to a motivated group.

Appreciation of Diversity: Jacqueline Skinner

The workshop focuses on the fundamental concepts of nondefensive communications. Through discussion and role-play activities you will learn how to avoid power struggles and other obstacles to effective communication.

Business Week '89 to Prepare Students

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

The Cameron School of Business Administration of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington will again devote a week in March to Business Week '89. This is the Seventh Annual Business Week for UNCW.

Business Week '89 will start with the Ninth Annual Commerce Cup Challenge, originally called the Business Bowl. The Business Bowl was designed in 1980 to give business students the opportunity to demonstrate their academic learning. The Commerce Cup Challenge was such a success for two years that the Cameron School of Business Administration decided to add a week's activities geared towards business students.

"The Business Administration realizes the greatest challenge is to bridge the gap between academic theory and the real world of business," says Dr. Lee Sherman, Chairman of Business Week. "College deans and professors are coming under increasing pressures from state legislatures, corporations, and students themselves to keep business from being the Ivory Tower of business education. Thus, Business Week was designed to bridge the gap between theory and practice."

Representatives from local and national businesses, industries, and corporations are invited to Business Week to discuss subjects pertaining to their field that will provide students with knowledge of the real world not found in textbooks. As UNCW grew, the Business School courses developed multiple sections and it was difficult to get speakers to address these multiple classes. The only way to handle this was to cancel business classes for two days so speakers could address large groups of students at one time."

The Cameron School of Business Administration recognizes that many students have misconceptions about the business world. To dispel these misconceptions, these guest speakers discuss current issues and trends in their fields. Most of the fields covered include management, marketing, economics, financing, accounting, production, and decision sciences.

The high point of every Business Week is the Keynote Address which is open to the public. The address is given by someone who is recognized as a leader in the field of business. This is a part of the school's continuing effort to provide students with real world learning from successful professionals.

The Masters of Business Administration Address is geared towards Cameron School of Business students. This speaker discusses a topic of international significance, then holds an open forum for students and faculty to exchange information and knowledge.

The Business Week activities are wrapped up by a softball game between the faculty and Sigma Alpha Beta, an honorary business fraternity and service organization.

"We are hoping to increase the number of high caliber students here at UNCW and The Business Week is an opportunity for these students to broaden their minds through their classroom learning and practical application," says Sherman.

Research Grants Awarded

(UNCW News) --Three research grants totaling $61,518 have been awarded recently to The University of North Carolina at Wilmington for marine-related research.

Dr. Sybil K. Burgess, associate professor of chemistry, has received a two-year Greenwall Foundation Grant for $12,708 from the Research Corporation for research on a project titled "Characterization of Proteins Involved in Biomineralizations of Callinectes sapidus Cuticle." Burgess, in collaboration with Dr. Robert D. Roer of the UNCW Center for Marine Science Research, has been using the blue crab, Callinectes sapidus, to study control of biomineralization. Their studies indicate that specialized proteins may be inhibiting shell hardening (biomineralization) before the crab molts. The goal of this research is to identify, isolate and chemically characterize these inhibitory proteins.

The UNC Sea Grant Program has approved additional funding for two research grants currently underway at UNCW. The first project, "Sources of Primary Productivity Supporting North Carolina's Reef Fish Communities," under the direction of Dr. David Lindquist, professor of biology, Dr. Larry Cahoon, associate professor of biology and Dr. Ilana Clavijo, assistant professor of biology was awarded $19,834 and the second project, "Evaluation of Plasmid Profiles as a Method to Determine the Source of Fecal Pollution in an Estuarine Environment," directed by Dr. Ron Sizemore, chairman for the department of biology, was awarded $16,076.

Research Corporation has awarded $12,900 for research project titled "Microspectro photometric and Karyological Studies of Chromosome and Nuclear DNA Variation Patterns in Marine Algae." Project director for the research is Dr. Donald Kaprun, professor of biology.

Warwick to Speak

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

March 13-17 Cameron School of Business Administration presents the seventh annual Business Week at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. The week is designed "to bridge the gap between academic theory and the real world of business" for UNCW students interested in the working world of the 1990's.

"Preparing for Tomorrow Today" is the Business Week theme. Admission is free to all events and, unless otherwise noted, are open to the public.

Business Week will formally start with the Commerce Cup Challenge on March 13 from 4:00 - 6:30 p.m. in Cameron Hall 105. All business students are urged to participate. All faculty, staff and students are welcome to watch this battle of the minds.

Patterned after "The College Bowl," and formally called "The Business Bowl," The Commerce Cup Challenge allows students to demonstrate their academic skills in a competitive but relaxed atmosphere.

The semifinals and finals of The Commerce Cup Challenge will be held Tuesday, March 14, at 4 p.m. in Cameron Hall 105. There will be plenty of room for all in the Cameron School's new large auditorium.

"Working For A Fortune 500 Company" will be the topic of the keynote address by William J. Warwick at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, March 15 in Kenan Auditorium on the UNCW campus.

Warwick is the President of AT&T Microelectronics, based in Berkeley Heights, New Jersey. Warwick has played a major role, as a manager, in redirecting the company, following the departure from the Bell System. Prior to his current position Warwick helped lead AT&T's telephone instrument and consumer product business to renewed leadership in the nation's new telecommunications environment.

All interested persons are cordially invited by The Cameron School of Business Administration to attend this free address. No tickets are necessary.

The end of Business Week '89 will bring students and faculty together with the annual softball competition between CSBA faculty and the honorary business fraternity, Sigma Alpha Beta. All CSBA faculty members are encouraged to participate in the game on Friday, March 17, at the UNCW Athletic Field at 3:00 p.m.

UNCW Gospel Choir Performs

BY PATRICE BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

An evening of good music was promised to the crowd that filled St. Luke A.M.E. Zion Church Saturday night and spilled over into the balcony. The music was presented by the UNCW Gospel Choir who was celebrating their 10th anniversary.

After preliminary devotions and remarks, the choir marched up the aisle in robes of eggshell and blue.

Although their singing made up the bulk of the evening, guest choirs from Elizabethtown, Elizabeth City, Goldsboro, and Jacksonville, NC contributed a sample of their music to the program.

The choir was founded in 1979 by Elder E.A. Perry, who served as Master of Ceremonies Saturday night.

It is run totally by students, such as sophomore Alicia Worrell, who is business manager for the choir. She basically sets up appointments and schedules singing engagements, which she says is a "busy position" because "so many people want [the choir] to sing."

Worrell became interested in the choir because of her love for gospel music, which she says everybody in the choir shares. This is true even though the members come from different religious backgrounds. Ms. Worrell said that her interest in the choir stemmed from the fact that her sister Wanda is the directress of the choir. Wanda Worrell is a graduate student in Special Education and has been with the choir since the spring of 1985.

their accomplishments, calling them "ambassadors" and "a good representation of UNCW" in their travels.

Parker also helps arrange for the annual tour the choir embarks on to various cities

"...There is also 'more emphasis on perfection' during performances..."

Worrell said that since '85 the membership has grown (43 members) and they have moved from a "more traditional gospel to a contemporary sound." There is also "more emphasis on perfection" during performances, whereas before the choir was more like a club, says Worrell.

Ralph Parker, Director of Minority Affairs, presided over the program. Parker is a past recipient of a special recognition award given by the choir for his "supportive" services, says Alicia Worrell.

He praised the choir on and states along the Eastern Seaboard. In the past the choir has performed in places like Newport News, VA; Richmond, VA; Washington, D.C., and various cities in North Carolina.

This year the tour, which began the first half of spring break, will include Pittsboro, NC; Goldsboro, NC; Richmond, VA; and possibly Baltimore, MD.

Alicia Worrell says this year has been one of the best for the gospel choir, and they are hoping to do an album in the near future.

Spring Break Excitement

Students Rely On Fries

DORA JOHNSON
STAFF WRITER

Even with the threat of major health problems due to high amounts of fat and cholesterol in the diet, UNCW students are still wolfing down "tons of french fries" each week in the campus cafeteria.

"Students are not really concerned. The majority of them don't care about cholesterol and fats," said Paul Dressner, Location Mgr. for ARA services. "Why do you think there are so many pizza places in town? They serve what the public wants. Not that pizza isn't nutritional to a certain extent, but it does contain more than a fair share of fat."

Between 2500 and 2700 meals are served each day through ARA services on campus.

ARA is a system experienced in food service," said Dressner. "We are here basically to save the school money, and to provide students with a well balanced meal."

The term "a well balanced meal" doesn't seem to describe the food provided on campus to some students. The way it is presented has scared many students into eating off campus.

"The cafeteria food just doesn't look healthy. It looks greasy most of the time, you can take a napkin and wipe it off the hamburger sometimes," said Lori Czaniecki, sophomore Business Management major.

"I would eat more salads, but most of the time the lettuce is brown," said Pam Long, sophomore Communications major.

"I paid for a 21 meal plan, and most of the time I end up going out to a fast food place to get something to eat. What they serve is not very appealing. Out of that plan I eat maybe 10 meals a week, and that's mostly cereal," said Jason Waldrop, sophomore Business major.

Communication between cafeteria officials and the student body seems to be the problem.

Dressner welcomes ideas from students that are concerned with the nutritional status of their meals, but there has been no move to do so.

"Students have not come forward and asked us to post nutritional facts about the food or had any suggestions on how we can better serve them. If they don't ask us how can we know what they want," said Dressner.

Many students were not aware of the fact that they could have some say in how their meals are set up.

"Being a student you really don't feel that you have a say in what goes on administratively on campus. We pay our tuition and hope that it is used to better serve us," said Samantha Medlin, junior Marketing major.

With the money allotted to the ARA on campus from meal plans set up for on campus and off campus housing Dressner feels that they do offer a reasonable variety of nutritional entrees.

"On our menu we offer at least one entree that contains a low amount of fat, like baked chicken, for example. But students would rather have the fried. You wouldn't believe the amount of french fries we go through in a week."

But even though they do serve fried foods Dressner feels they are still concerned about the nutritional value of what they serve.

"We try to keep down the amount of fats that we use. Only the best unsaturated fats are used for frying and the meat we use contains 80% meat and 20% fat."

Amounts of fats and cholesterol in their diet does seem to concern some students.

"I try to stay away from the greasy foods and eat more vegetables and fish," said Rodney Ingle, junior Speech Communications major.

"My family has a history of high cholesterol, and as I get older I try to watch what I eat more closely."

Dressner feels that his job is to better serve UNCW through ARA, and ARA is doing a pretty good job.

"We are sort of stuck between a rock and a hard place. We want to provide for the student, but until they come forward and voice their own opinions we can't make any progress toward better serving them."

UNCW Plays Host To Indian Ambassador Kaul

(UNCW NEWS) — UNCW will be host to P.K. Kaul, the Indian Ambassador to the United States, Feb. 28 through March 2.

During the visit, the ambassador will meet with the Indian community in New Hanover County, give a public address, and meet with business and government officials.

The public is invited to attend the free lecture at UNC Wilmington at 7:30 p.m., Wednesday, March 1, in the auditorium of Cameron Hall. The topic of his talk is "Indo-U.S. Relations: A Changing Perspective."

UNCW Chancellor William H. Wagoner invited Ambassador Kaul to visit UNCW at the request of Dr. Ravi Kalia, assistant professor of history who specializes in Asian history. Kalia is developing an Asia interest group among faculty with diverse international interests, including business, political science, and history.

Appointed ambassador in August 1986, Kaul joined the Indian Administrative Service in 1951. He held a series of administrative posts in India; served as additional secretary, Ministry of commerce in 1976-1980, and was secretary for export development in the Ministry of Commerce between May and September 1980.

Beginning in September, 1980, he was named Commerce secretary, a position which he held until August 1981 when he became defense secretary. Kaul served in this position until June 1983, following which he was named finance secretary and secretary for economic affairs. In February 1985, he was named cabinet secretary and served in this capacity until his appointment as ambassador of India to the United States in August, 1986.

Born, July 3, 1929, Kaul was educated at the University of Allahabad where he earned the bachelor's and master's degrees in economics. He also holds a master's degree in public administration from Harvard University.

On Thursday, March 2, Kaul will meet with representatives of the Greater Wilmington Chamber of Commerce to discuss new business opportunities in India and how to get started. He will also attend a 4 p.m. reception in the assembly room of the New Hanover County Courthouse sponsored by the City of Wilmington and New Hanover County.

That evening he will be the keynote speaker for the 6:30 p.m. meeting of the Cape Fear Chapter of the N.C. World Trade Association at Justice's. The topic that evening will be "New Business and The Economic Environment in India."

Admission Standards On The Rise

BY KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

As a result of tougher admission standards, a degree from UNCW may soon begin to carry more clout.

UNCW is gaining the reputation as an academically sound university, and not just [a place] for social gathering," said Ray Cockrell, Admissions Counselor.

Diane Zeeman, Director of Undergraduate Admissions, thinks that "this may be due to the fact that we are denying more students. Because the number of applications received by the Admissions Office has increased yearly, the university is able to be more selective in who they admit."

As of February 1, the Admissions Office had received 5,554 applications for the freshman class next fall. At the same time last year, only 3,954 applications had been received. For the fall semester, only 3,600 students will be admitted.

According to Zeeman, the pleasing part about rising admissions standards, is that the more qualified students being admitted are less likely to fail out.

"Most of these students [being admitted] have a better [educational] background coming in, they should do better academically while they are here, and the graduation rate will improve," said Zeeman.

The students that have been admitted for next year meet a 1.9 predictor. The predictor for each applicant is figured out by plugging their high school GPA and SAT scores into a formula. This formula predicts their GPA at UNCW. In 1984, a 1.6 predictor was necessary. This number has since been raised to 1.9, and should continue to rise.

Zeeman said, "This won't be decided until we see what our actual enrollments are for next fall."

"Whether the standards go up or not, we are under budgetary constraints at UNCW."

The budget for expansion comes from the N.C. State legislature. UNCW is allotted a set each year.

"The way it's been in the past, we've been given an allowance, in a sense, to increase enrollment by 100 students each year. This is usually in the freshman class," said Zeeman.

"[UNCW's] growing up," said Zeeman, "We're only 19 years old and that's pretty young, in the age of [a state] university. We've gone through some growing pains, as teenagers do and we've had some awkward moments, but I think we're finally reaching a level of maturity where we are beginning to be respected as a university - not just as 'the college by K-Mart.'"

Renter's Insurance Carries Benefits

BY CAROL TREMBLAY
STAFF WRITER

Renter's Insurance may not seem like a vital investment to you right now, but what would you do if your apartment was burglarized one night and your $2,000 stereo system was stolen?

Take the sad story of a recent disaster in Wilmington of the fire at Governor's Square, for example.

Twelve apartments were engulfed in flames this past Sunday from unknown causes (at the time of this writing). Only two out of the 12 households had a renter's policy. The other 10 are left beginning their lives all over again from scratch.

Unfortunately, it usually takes something drastic like this to happen for anyone to take action to protect themselves and their assets.

Ray Harrison of Prudential Insurance says there are many benefits to having a renter's insurance policy.

"(1) protects your personal property; (2) gives you additional funds to help with moving expenses (if they exceed your original living expenses); (3) protects the policy holder from liability charges ($100,000 coverage is recommended); and (4) covers medical payments (for those hurt in the home)."

Harrison also makes some suggestions for making the return on your loss quicker and easier.

The simplest way to keep a record of your belongings is to take pictures of them.

But to get the most accurate refund, it is better to keep records of the model, serial number, and cost you paid at the time of purchase (and preferably the approximate date the item was bought).

But there are also some things to take into account.

First, an insurance company will not cover an apartment or rental home with over two unrelated occupants.

The premium will vary from company to company. Prudential requests a one-shot annual payment of $65 for $10,000 property coverage - which includes $100,000 liability coverage, $1,000 medical, and $2,000 "loss of use" funds.

Prudential offers renter's insurance at "competitive rates." The premium above is based on $10,000 worth of property coverage. In order to increase the coverage (if you own more than $10,000 in personal belongings in your home), you would have to pay a higher premium. "Nearly double for double the coverage," says Harrison.

TEACHING EXCELLENCE AWARD

for excellence in teaching and outstanding services at
The University of North Carolina
at Wilmington

NATURE AND PURPOSE OF THE AWARD

The Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award is designed to exemplify this institution's commitment to teaching excellence. Recipients of the award shall manifest excellence as persons who have made and continue to make significant contributions to higher education through their dedication and service to students.

The $1,500 cash award carries with it both an honor and a responsibility. It will specify a member of the faculty as a person of excellence and it will call upon him or her to share that excellence with colleagues and students.

CRITERIA FOR CONSIDERATION

A nominee for the Teaching Excellence Award must be a current member of the UNCW faculty who has been teaching at least half-time for five semesters or more. The nominee must have demonstrated a mastery of and enthusiasm for the subject taught, restlessness in maintaining high academic standards, a genuine interest in each student's intellectual and creative development, and an ability to foster respect for diverse points of view and an openness to learning.

PROCEDURE FOR NOMINATIONS

Nominations may be submitted by any member of the faculty, currently enrolled students, alumni or persons in the larger community served by the university.

All letters of nomination must be limited to one page and must be received no later than 5:00 p.m. on Friday, March 3, 1989, by the Chancellor's Nomination Committee, Room 114, Alderman Hall, 601 South College Road, Wilmington, North Carolina 28403.

SELECTION PROCESS

The Chancellor, after consultation with the Chairman of the Faculty Senate, will designate members of the Chancellor's Nomination Committee. After reviewing the nominations, the Committee will make its recommendation to the Chancellor. He will present the recipient of the 1989 Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award to the Board of Trustees in July 1989.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RECIPIENT

The recipient of the 1989 Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award will be announced in July 1989.

Way Out In (W)right Field

Chris Wright
Sports Editor

Larry, Curly, and Moe

Robert McPherson had every right to be "sarcastic as hell" following Monday night's slugfest against American University.

It was only fitting that the game, in which a total of 47 fouls were called and 58 free throws were attempted, would be won or lost at the charity stripe.

And despite the claim made by American coach Ed Tapscoott that the late calls made by the latest rendition of the three stooges were correct, he still found time to remark about their incompetency and inadequacy.

"Our conference officials need more clarity in their decision making. At times they were inconsistent tonight."

And how. McPherson, justifiably more upset because his squad was on the down side of the 71-70 verdict was not so understanding.

"A well called ball game," he said in a disgusted tone. "And I'm being sarcastic as hell."

The officials simply took the game out of the players hands.

"Our effort was pretty good," senior Greg Bender, one of three seniors playing in his final home game, said. "But we can't allow the officials to take over. We have got to decide it ourselves."

UNCW had a chance to decide it themselves, sort of.

With five seconds remaining Antonio Howard drove the baseline. He was fouled as he was attempting to shoot. A two shot foul.

No. A one-and-one was called because one official overruled and said Howard was fouled before he was fouled in the act of shooting.

McPherson said he was over at the official scorer's table when the official announced a two shot foul.

Howard, when asked whether or not he was fouled beforehand, said "I don't think so. But regardless, I should have hit it. Thinking about the call just makes me madder."

The Call cost the Hawks a chance of redeeming themselves in the CAA tournament against William and Mary, who they were scheduled to face in the opening round, assuming they finished second.

Tapscoott said the officials made the proper call. From where I was sitting, which was a hell of a lot closer to the play than Tapscoott, I saw him get fouled at least three times, but there is no way he should not have been granted a two-shot foul.

I'm not making excuses for Antonio because for one, after singlehandedly carrying the offensive burden with 26 points, he doesn't need it, but I can assure you that he would have been under less pressure had he been given two chances.

With the ball game on the line, he was the guy who I wanted to see on the line, but more importantly, he wanted to be there.

This was his final home game. As he said, he was in control of his own destiny. He said the front end of the one-and-one felt good when he let it go. It looked long to me, but that is not the issue.

The issue is that three seniors, who have busted their tails earning acclaim and adding credibility for UNCW, were cheated out of a story-book ending by a group of inconsistent officials, and a coach, whom I have previously berated for his in-house policies, rose and took precedence by coming to the defense of his players by outwardly criticizing certain highly questionable calls.

I know the loss has to bother the three seniors, and through no fault of his own, probably is more bothersome to Howard, but I'll be willing to bet it bothers McPherson even more.

You may not like him, but you have to at least respect the manner and extremes he goes to in protecting his players.

Never, ever play "burnout" with Nolan Ryan.

Hawks Fall to Fourth as CAA Nears Houzer, Howard Lead UNCW Past Navy American Steals 71-70 Victory

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

UNCW closed out National Condom Week in appropriate fashion Saturday night as they effectively stopped the Sea Men of Navy, 65-60, to regain a second place conference tie in front of a near sellout Homecoming crowd at Trask Coliseum.

The win kept alive hopes of a possible rematch with William and Mary in the opening round of the CAA tournament. The Tribe earlier handed the Hawks their most embarrassing defeat of the season, and the possibility of meeting them in Hampton served as an incentive against Navy.

"Oh yeah," joked senior Larry Houzer. "We want (William and Mary) really bad. We're using that as a motivating factor to win these last games. They should have never beaten us. That loss went through the league. It was embarrassing. I will personally try to make it a crowd pleaser."

In order to face the Tribe, UNCW must finish second in the regular season standings. They moved a step closer to the showdown as they fought off a stubborn Navy squad that was without its best player, 6'6" swingman Eddie Reddick.

"We were outmanned on the boards tonight," Navy coach Pete Hermann said. "Without Reddick in the lineup, we don't have a 'gato' guy. Obviously we're a better team with him in there but you have to give our guys a lot of credit. They didn't quit. We usually play a tough game against UNCW."

Saturday night was no exception. After jumping out to a quick 9-2 lead on Brannon Lancaster's 15-footer, the Midshipmen battled their way back, exploiting UNCW's defense for several backdoor layups to help take a 30-23 halftime lead.

"They surprised us," Houzer said. "They came out aggressive n the first half and scored on the backdoor. Coach (McPherson) drew it up at halftime and we were able to adjust and force them into some turnovers in the second half."

Houzer opened the final period by hitting two free throws to give the Hawks a 31-30 advantage.

The lead changed hands six times thereafter, with Navy's last lead coming off of a Steve Cook layup with 10:57 remaining.

Senior Greg Bender followed Antonio Howard's jumper with two free throws to regain the lead for good at 47-45. The Hawks then relied on pressure defense to stop the Middles halfcourt attack.

"The last nine minutes we showed great composure," McPherson said. "The main thing was taking away the back door. In the first half, the man guarding their high post man was not dropping down to help out. We came out in the second half and forced two straight turnovers. After that they went to the halfcourt offense, and without Reddick, we held the advantage."

UNCW stretched the lead to seven two separate times as Howard and Houzer combined for six straight Seahawk points midway through the second period.

Houzer, averaging 22.5 points in his last five outings, equalled that with a game high 22. The CAA's second leading field goal shooter connected on eight of 13 attempts.

Howard, the teams leading scorer at 18.7 points per game, bettered that average by chipping in 20.

The Seahawks (8-4 in the conference) can secure a second place finish, and chance to play the Indians again, by winning their final two CAA games against American and ECU, respectively.

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

For the second time this season American University, combined tenacious defense, solid offense, and most importantly charitable officiating to defeat UNCW.

Last month, Larry Houzer hit a three-pointer that would have won the ball game, but the officials ruled it was released after the horn. Monday night, Antonio Howard drove the baseline with five seconds remaining and was fouled while attempting to make a layup, but the officials ruled that he was fouled before he attempted the shot and awarded him a one-and-one opportunity.

He subsequently missed and American escaped Trask Coliseum with a 71-70 win that was marked by mass confusion and scattered debris, thrown from distraught fans following Howard's miss.

"I'm not going to think about whether or not it was a one-and-one or a two shot foul," Howard said. "Thinking about it makes it worse. I wanted to be on the line. There is no excuse for me not making it. It hurts, but I just have to bounce back."

Confusion set in after Howard missed. A wild scramble ensued and the ball was knocked out of bounds and awarded to American.

UNCW head coach Robert McPherson thought a two shot foul had been called.

"The official scorekeeper and clock operator said the official told them it was a two-shot foul," McPherson said. "The other official said it was a one-and-one."

American coach Ed Tapscoott was disappointed in the proficiency of the officials, but agreed they made the proper call on Howard.

"That was the correct call," he said. "If it had been called on West, it should have been a two-shot foul. If it was on Tillman, like they said, then it should have been a one-and-one."

"This is difficult," Tapscoott continued. "(The officials) were inconsistent. All those kids deserve better. I'd like to see better officiating than what we got and Bob would too."

Senior Greg Bender who fouled out of his last home game, but not until he brought the Hawks to within one point on a three-pointer from the top of the key echoed the theme.

"The referees decided it," he said. "It was definitely a two-shot foul. I don't see how they got a one-and-one out of it. You can't let the officials decide it. You have to decide it yourself."

American outscored the Hawks 37-31 over the final twenty minutes to seal the come-from-behind-victory.

"I told our kids at halftime that we were only down two except for Lancaster's three-pointer at the buzzer," Tapscoott said. "And considering Draper only played four minutes, I liked our chances."

Howard West hit both ends of a one-and-one to give American its largest lead 69-65 with 1:24 remaining.

Bender's three-point reduced the lead to one before Tillman hit two free throws with forty-seven seconds remaining for a 71-68 lead. Howard then scored on a layup to close out the Seahawk scoring.

Howard finished with a game-high 26 points for the Seahawks (8-5) who now must regroup before Wednesday's encounter with Campbell.

Seahawks Overcome Weather, Duke

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

UNCW overcame treacherous footing and frigid temperatures as they interchanged hot hitting with timely pitching to defeat Duke University, 10-6, Sunday in their home-opener at Brooks Field.

"We survived the weather," head coach Bobby Guthrie said. "We came out early to work on the field, but it didn't dry as quickly as we thought. The weather made ground balls adventurous."

UNCW opened quickly, sliding to a 5-0 first inning lead, capped by catcher Mike Ferrell's two-run home run. Duke pushed across one run in the second as Ron Esquires walked and eventually scored from third on a sacrifice fly from David Norman.

The Seahawks countered in the bottom half, as Randy Hill singled and scored on Tom Heiter's RBI double to give UNCW a 6-1 lead.

Duke rallied, touching starting pitcher Randy Tillman for three runs over the next two innings to narrow the deficit to 6-4.

Tillman was lifted in the top of the fourth as Duke followed up a lead-off home run by former South Brunswick star Quinton McCracken, with two walks and a Seahawk error to load the bases with just one out.

Guthrie called on junior righthander Tommie Adams, voted UNCW's Most Valuable Pitcher last year, to replace Tillman. After giving up a sacrifice fly to Esquires, Adams got Tim Rumor to ground softly back to the box for the final out.

"Last year I got used to relieving," Adams said. "So the bases loaded situation didn't really bother me."

After Adams surrendered a solo home run to Charlie Sullivan in the top half of the sixth that pulled the Devils to within one run, the Hawks again used the long ball to cushion the lead, as they erupted for three runs in the bottom half.

"We battled hard," Guthrie said. "With the weather we were going to make some mistakes. But every time Duke scored, we came right back. The two home runs were not a big surprise. We hit four in our last intrasquad game, so we knew the potential was there."

Heiter's third hit of the game, a sixth-inning, two-run shot over the left field wall put the game out of reach, 9-6.

"It felt pretty good swinging the bat," Heiter said. "I'm seeing the ball well. That's the key. It's like what coach Foy told me. He said to look for location rather than a certain pitch and if I got it, then turn on it."

Adams then closed the Blue Devil offense down. Twice, though, he escaped bases-loaded jams, including Duke's final challenge in the seventh when he retired the side by forcing Tom Hawkins to ground into a 1-2-3 double play.

Tim Hook's RBI groundout scored pinchhitter Joe Catalana in the seventh accounted for the final margin.

"Adams did a good job for us," Guthrie said. "I thought that was a key. He came in and got Tony out of a jam and then got himself into some jams but was able to get out of them."

Tillman, a sophomore, started and allowed five hits and three earned runs before being lifted. He walked seven while striking out two.

Adams, a transfer from N.C. State, recorded his first victory of the season, pitching nearly five innings and surrendering just two runs.

Sophomore Jerome Hunt preserved the victory by throwing a perfect ninth inning.

Heiter paced the Seahawks (1-0) with three hits and Ferrell collected two. Each drove in three runs. UNCW will face Liberty University Wednesday at 3 p.m. at Brooks Field.

Hawkster's Performance Earns Cheers

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

If you can put up with a hoarse voice, long practice sessions, sore limbs, and maintain a full dedication to boosting school spirit then you may have the stuff to be a UNCW cheerleader.

Cheerleading you say; isn't that kid's stuff? All you do is jump up and down and yell, right? If this is your conception on this sport then you're way off the mark. True, this may be what high school and lower level cheerleaders do but it is a totally different story once you reach the collegiate level.

Gymnastics is one of the keys to successful cheerleading and the UNCW group is no exception. They practice 3-6 hours a week at the Wilmington Gymnastic Center working on flips, cartwheels, and multiple tumbling combinations.

When the team's not working on acrobatic maneuvers, time is focused on individual spotting and timing between pair partners. "Timing is everything in cheerleading. You have to get in to a rhythm with your partner if you want to be successful," said Hawkster Marc Lyczkowski. The team spends 3-4 hours working on the various tosses and spots needed to pull off complex tricks like pyramid building. Partners consist of one guy and one girl who are at the same ability level. They must have complete trust in one another to perform the lifts and tosses without complications, and to prevent injuries from occurring.

"At first it's kind of scary: being up in the air with no support other than your partner, but you've got to trust him to be good," said Hawkster Co-Captain Carrie Cannan.

"It's hard getting over that natural fear of dropping your partner or messing up," said Co-Captain, and Carrie's partner, Curt Nichols.

There is conditioning involved in performing such events as tosses and one-foot holds. The gentlemen must possess strong arms, wrists, and legs. They lift weights to build up biceps and pectoral muscles so they can give their partner a firm place to stand or land on.

The young ladies must be extremely flexible and light weight so that they can be tossed and caught with relative ease. There is a scale in the practice room that is often the cause of groans and sighs from the Lady Hawksters.

"I've been cheering for three years and it keeps me in shape," said Cannan.

Along with gymnastic maneuvers, spotting techniques, and conditioning exercises; cheerleaders have to come up with new ways of firing up the crowd with new cheers and gimmicks.

The green hankey that is tossed high in the air rousing the crowd's cheers and bringing them to their feet was the brainchild of Mark Lyczkowski. He borrowed the hankey idea from Campbell University and hopes it will become a proud tradition here at UNCW for years to come.

Another example of cheering ingenuity is the theme idea for heated rival games. This year they worked out the skin head routine especially for Coach Lefty Drissell and the surgical mask against contracting measles from the East Carolina squad.

The cheerleaders also have to work with the school mascot the Seahawk, who is played by Rick Meadow. They coordinate cheers and stunts around his crazy antics. All the cheerleaders concurred that the Seahawk was fun to work with out on the court. Often the cheers are conducted in the stands in order to increase fan competition. "You have to get the crowd pump out because they're the only ones who get the team up," said Lyczkowski.

Every year cheerleading teams present a tape to the Universal Cheering Association in hopes of qualifying for the National Collegiate Cheerleading Championships.

Teams must present one cheer segment, one fight song routine, and one crowd scene in which they got the fans involved in the action. Last year UNCW was an alternate to go to the first round of the championships. This year they were finally invited to compete. "The crowd participation was a big plus for us but we weren't positive [that] we made it until the PA announcer told us during the Richmond Game," said a happy Lyczkowski.

The UNCW team will go up against University of Alabama-Birmingham, Appalachian State, and Morehead State in Division I-A in San Antonio, Texas.

If the Seahawks can win that division they'll compete in the finals against the perennial powers of N.C. State and Penn State in the Division I competition, to be held in Florida.

The Seahawks will have two minutes and 20 seconds to show their talents. A minute and 40 seconds will have music accompaniment and each squad must include a cheer and a sideline chant. In previous years good audience participation would often influence the judges in giving higher marks. Strong crisp arm movements, solid balance and lifts, and smooth transitions from the music segment to the plain cheer are crucial in posting top scores.

Finally, all 14 members of the squad must appear to be in perfect sequence with one another and a big smile never hurts.

The judging is based on a 100 point scale in five categories with breakdown of points as follows: communication and projection-10 points, fundamental cheerleading skills-30 points, group technique-15 points, crowd appeal-image-and overall effect-20 points, and ability to effectively lead and involve the crowd-25 points.

As you can see the Seahawks have their work cut out for them in Texas. They will have to first get past both Morehead and Appalachian State who will be the favorites in the tourney. The Hawks will be taking a fairly experienced squad and three year Co-Captain Carrie Cannan feels positive on the team chances.

"I think we have a good shot on winning," said Cannan.

It will take a lot of hard work and determination, but the Seahawks appear dedicated and ready for action. They will strut their final stuff at the CAA Championships in Hampton, Va. before they turn their full attention to the Championships at hand. So cheers to our Varsity cheerleaders and may your voice be with you.

Icehaws Win

BY MAL NGUYEN
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

Once again, the UNCW Hockey Club showed their superior power in a game against the local College Road Animal Hospital Team on Monday, February 20. UNCW's hockey players seemed to have a rather difficult time getting organized in the first two periods of the game.

Due to their slow start, the College Road team slipped by a goal and were leading as they entered the second period. The alertness of the Hawks steadily became acute as they tied the score (1-1) by the end of period two.

Finally, the Icehaws climbed to a meteoric rise by exploding with power in the last period.

Scott Petersen explains that "The action became more intense as the game came to a close." The Hawks claimed victory as they glided away with the 5-2 score. Howie Malloy played an exceptional game, sinking in two of the five goals.

Danny Morganello, Carl Potter, and Keith Roach also scored one goal each. Goalie J. P. Christie made some spectacular saves by shutting out many of the Hospital's attempts.

UNCW Runners Set 22 Outdoor Records

STAFF REPORTS

Two weeks ago, the men's and women's track teams continued their steady improvement by establishing 22 new school records.

The Hawks opened the week on Feb. 8th at the Tarheel Indoor Invitational in Chapel Hill by placing in six open events. UNCW was led by sophomore, Don Scott by winning the 880 yard run in a school record time of 2:01.8. Layne Fuller made it a clean sweep by lacing second in 2:03.

The women were led by freshman, Diana Jones who placed in four events (55 meters, LJ, TJ and shot).

On Saturday February 11th, the Seahawks moved outdoors to host Coastal Carolina College and Pembroke State University in their first-ever home track meet. The Hawks ran aggressively to 11 first place finishes and 12 new outdoor records.

AT A GLANCE

Bray to Speak SWAP Meeting

The Social Worker's Association for People is proud to have James Bray speak at the March 16th SWAP meeting. Mr. Bray is the director of the UNCW Career Planning and Placement Center. He plans to discuss job opportunities, interview behavior, and resume preparation. The meeting is scheduled at 3:30 in room 202 of the Social and Behavioral Sciences Building. All UNCW students are invited to attend the meeting.

Applications Being Accepted for ACE Positions

The ACE crew is seeking new officers and members for the 1989-90 school year. The University Program Board, which has now been changed to ACE, is associated with providing a variety of entertainment for our university. Applications for positions will be available on March 13 in Room 202-C of the UU. This will include positions for Pres., Vice Pres., Secretary, Treasurer and several others. Interviews will be at the end of March, followed by training also. So come on and join us, for its a great opportunity and a world of fun!

SADD Meets Thursdays

Students Against Drunk Driving meets weekly in Room 206 UU, every Thursday at 5:30. Please join us as we plan activities for the remainder of the Spring Semester.

Bad Poetry Contest

The 2nd Annual Bad Poetry Contest sponsored by the English Club, Crazy Pizza, and Sea Breeze Yogurt will be held March 2 (Time and place TBA). Prizes and gift certificates from area restaurants will be awarded. Everyone, especially faculty, staff, and students, is invited to participate, and a good time is expected to be had by all!

For further information contact Gena Winstead or Anderson Brewer.

Graduating Seniors

Genealogical Society To Meet

An organizational meeting of the Old New Hanover County Genealogical Society will be held on March 4th at 2:00 pm in the meeting room of the New Hanover County Public Library. The only requirement for membership is an interest in sharing and promoting research.

Vending / Residence Hall Scholarship

Two scholarships are now available for Residence Hall students who have made strong contributions to the development of a positive and productive Residence Life community. The contributions may be specific to a floor, hall or on campus level. Applications can be picked up for your Resident Director or Resident Assistant. APPLICATION DEADLINE IS WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15. Scholarships will be awarded for the fall semester of 1989, and will pay the room fees for the fall semester of 1989. For more information, contact your Resident Director or Resident Assistant or the Office of Residence Life at 395-3241.

Indian Ambassador Speaks In Cameron

BY RICK HEYMANN
STAFF WRITER

Pratap K. Kaul, one of the four Indian Ambassadors to the United States, visited UNCW between February 28 through March 2 at the request of Dr. Ravi Kalia, Assistant Professor of History and Chancellor William H. Wagoner.

During his stop in Wilmington, Kaul was burdened by a heavy agenda of luncheons, dinners and speeches.

He held a press conference immediately after his late flight landed from Florida at New Hanover County Airport on Tuesday, then proceeded to his undisclosed hotel for a much needed rest.

On Wednesday, Kaul was the recipient of an ARA sponsored luncheon in the Hawk's Nest in order to address the faculty about the economic changes that India is presently experiencing.

His tight schedule then led him to Cameron Hall, where he spoke freely about the industrial growth, nuclear disarmament, and the growing trade with the U.S. that India so desperately desires.

During his speech, Kaul elaborated that democracy fosters better economic growth in India than other ideologies would, because of the ever-growing middle class. Since India is host to 800 million people, "25% of India's people are middle class; an encouraging number for the future," said Kaul.

"Increasing trade with the U.S. would benefit both nations. [India] is interested in processed food as an export in a country where agriculture is a large commodity. We are presently increasing the processing and storage quality as well as quantity of food," said Kaul.

On Thursday, he met with the Mayor of Wilmington and the Chamber of Commerce to elaborate on the financial opportunities India offers to the U.S.

Kaul's visit to UNCW, the first of its kind in Wilmington's history, was necessary, "to enlighten the awareness of the growing Asian Studies Program at UNCW," said Kalia. The Ambassador's three day stay in Wilmington "enhanced areas of mutual interest [between the U.S.], such as economic issues and joint ventures in academic research," he added.

By inviting the Ambassador, Kalia stated that he alone was the catalyst needed to attract attention to the university's growing interest in Asian studies.

"I was mulling over the idea with my department chairman when we both decided it would be beneficial to UNCW. I then got the arrangements approved by the Chancellors office," mentioned Kalia.

During the luncheon with Kaul in the Hawk's Nest on Wednesday, Kalia stated that Kaul seems genuinely interested in faculty sabbaticals and student exchange programs with the U.S.

"Building Blocks" Promoting Leadership

BY KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

Because of the need for stronger leadership amongst the student body at UNCW, Cathy Birmingham, Assistant Director for Leadership Development, has designed "Building Blocks."

"Building Blocks" consists of a series of 17 seminars and workshops designed to improve the leadership skills of heads of organizations as well as its members.

"The students at UNCW need more self-confidence and self-esteem. ... many don't realize that they have the power and ability to make a difference."

The subjects of these workshops range from effective communication, cultural awareness, and legal liability, to goal setting, leadership in Business, and leaders in transition.

Each program is designed to help students understand the different aspects of leadership.

"The students at UNCW need more self-confidence and self-esteem. There are a lot of talented people with a lot to offer, but many [UNCW students] don't realize that they have the power and ability to make a difference," says Birmingham.

Although the program is open for participation for the entire campus, there has been minimal interest displayed thus far. Only five or six students participated in the first five workshops.

In order to make students aware of the program, Birmingham posted bulletins and sent newsletters to the approximate 100 student organizations on the UNCW campus.

"We were pushing for every organization to send a different member to each session. This person could then go back and give a mini-workshop to their group," says Birmingham.

The workshops could also benefit student-community relations.

Many persons within the community think that the sole purpose of a student group is to have big parties and get drunk.

Birmingham says that although she knows that the organizations are about friendship, support, and performing philanthropic activities for the university, much of the community disagrees.

"The seminars will teach students to give off a better image to the community and encourage them to put their best foot forward and be leaders in all that they do," says Birmingham.

Birmingham also says that there is a national trend of growing student involvement.

"I'd like to see that at UNCW. It seems that students want to help and it is the college that needs to help them [learn how to be involved]," she says.

At UNCW, this responsibility has been given to The Leadership Center.

The idea for the center began two years ago. The Leadership Advisory Board at UNCW, which is made up of students and staff members, came up with the idea. Officially, the center opened September 1, 1988, with the arrival of Cathy Birmingham.

Birmingham feels quite positive about the center and what it is doing to help students in their leadership responsibilities.

Birmingham says, "Leadership is very complex. We all need to be leaders at some point in our lives. Leadership is something that can be learned and we are here to provide that."

"Satanic Verses" Withheld; Censorship Un-American?

BY PATRICE BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

In October of 1985 obscenity laws were passed in North Carolina that directly affected the state campuses.

With these laws spreading throughout the nation, and the recent controversy and censoring of Salman Rushdie's novel The Satanic Verses, one wonders why these issues haven't touched UNCW.

"It's as unamerican as segregation," was Eugene W. Huguelt's response to the pulling of Rushdie's book from bookstores and libraries around the country, which incidently is on hand at the William Madison Randall Library.

Huguelt, head librarian at Randall Library, says that [the library] ordered Rushdie's book before all the controversy as they would order [other books] regularly, and its censorship is "very unfortunate and self-defeating."

"Freedom of speech is a large part of being an American," he says. "In a free society, no one has the right to control what can and cannot be read."

Huguelt says in 27 years he hasn't encountered censorship or complaints, because university libraries don't have to "bear the brunt" that public schools do in public scrutiny.

If confronted with the problem, Huguelt said he would show [complainers] a copy of the library's acquisitions policy, which governs how and what the library buys.

Within this acquisitions policy is the Library's Collection Development Policy, part of which states "because the University is dedicated to ...[the] scholarly examination of all ideas and current knowledge germane to any discipline, constant care will be taken...that no form of censorship, whether based on personal or ideological bias, will be allowed to circumscribe the development of any subject area of the Library's collections."

Phi Beta Sigma Outstanding Freshman Named

Wilmington, NC - Christine Ann Bricker, a freshman at The University of North Carolina at Wilmington majoring in political science, received the Phi Beta Sigma Outstanding Freshman Award in February. This award goes to a freshman with the highest grade point average for his or her first semester. Bricker has a 4.0 grade point average (GPA) with 20 credit hours.

Phi Beta Sigma is a national honor society. Once completing their freshman year, students are invited to join the honor society. They must have a cumulative GPA of at least 3.5 and make no grade below a "C" while taking a full course load.

Chris Bricker, left, the recipient of the Phi Beta Sigma Outstanding Freshman Award, is presented a thesaurus by Patricia Jordan, right, president of the honor society.

Small Business Association Donates $48,000+

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

UNCW's Small Business and Technology Development Center has received $48,932 from the Small Business Administration.

According to Ted Jans, director, "Funds will be used for staff and resources to aid the small businesses in Southeastern North Carolina. The Small Business and Technology Development Center serves as an outreach program for UNCW to the business community."

The SBTDC provides one-on-one confidential counseling and technical assistance to area small business owners and those who are planning to go into business.

"Small businesses within the Southeastern region of the state consult [us] for help with producing business plans, handling management problems, and expanding their business to international markets," says Jans.

The center is an inter-institutional program for the UNC system. There are ten regional service centers in North Carolina with the headquarters office in Raleigh.

The program started in late 1984 and is partially funded by the Small Business Administration each year. Their initial goal has been to aid the economic development of North Carolina by assisting in the start-up, successful operation, and expansion of small business.

BUILDING BLOCKS Schedule

Cultural Awareness

Jacqueline Skinner

Wed., March 15, UU 212, 4-5:30pm

What is your cultural IQ? Do you know whether or not the name "Oriental" is acceptable to Asians? Is the TV show "Miami Vice" an accurate portrayal of Hispanic Americans? This session focuses on raising your awareness of all cultures and the richness that cultural differences bring to our university community.

Influencing Public Perceptions of your Organization

Hunter Kome

Thurs., March 16, UU 212, 4-5:30 pm

Do you ever wonder why an ineffective leader is popular? Do you ever ask yourself why the public doesn't realize what a great job your organization is doing, but sees only the bad? This presentation explores a leader's need to be accountable to the public in addition to being a good manager.

Goal Setting: What is your Organization Trying to Accomplish?

Cathy Birmingham

Mon., March 20, UU 212, 4-5:30 pm

Most organizations tend to drift without a clear sense of direction. This workshop will address the need to establish clearly defined goals, to prioritize activities, and to create a system for monitoring your success.

CENSORSHIP

Dr. Barbara Waxman of the English Department says she has never had problems ordering literature for her classes, although she suggested a "silent censorship" may be going on in the publishing industry. She has recently tried to order books by black author Ishmael Reed, but they were inexplicably out of print, which may have political implications, suggested Waxman.

The controversy surrounding Rushdie's book sets freedom of speech advocates against Muslims who believe the book is blasphemous to the Islam religion.

Waxman says she is "dying to read [Satanic Verses]" because of the censorship, with she is totally opposed to. In response to its religious implications, she says Muslims don't have to read it, just as she, being Jewish, wouldn't pick up an anti-Semitic book and read it.

Huguleit insists censorship never works, because the more publicized the target of censorship, the more people will want to read it. According to Time magazine, sales of Satanic Verses plummeted after the Muslim outcry. In a university system, he says, "there is no place for it."

Marine Research Foundation Offers Two Scholarships

(UNCW NEWS)--- Two scholarships are being offered under the sponsorship of the Wrightsville Marine Research Foundation.

The scholarship will be offered to full-time UNCW students in good academic standing, who are interested in actively participating in research. The research will concern Science and civilization through the UNCW program in Science and Culture. Candidates will be selected on a competitive basis reflecting assessment of the selection committee of each applicant's qualifications, promise, and interests, regardless of color, creed or sex.

Tenure of these scholarships is contingent upon maintenance of satisfactory academic standing. In general, this implies that participation of a student in the research program be limited to no more than 15 hours per week. In general, such scholarships will be awarded to students who have achieved sophomore or more advanced standing.

Each scholarship will consist of a cash award of $1,500.00 per year, payable in two halves at the beginning of the fall and spring semesters respectively. Subject to the availability of funds and to adequate performance by the recipient it is the intent of the Foundation that WMRF scholars should continue to receive scholarship support for the duration of their residence at UNCW as undergraduate students.

Having A Failure To Communicate

There's a famous line in the movie "Cool Hand Luke" that states, "What we have here (pronounced he-yah) is a failure to communicate." In my pseudo attempt to be a college student, I find myself often wondering why this quote applies so well to the typical college scene.

This problem extends into virtually all areas of our life. We have this problems with the electric company, banks, our families, our "significant others" our roommates, our instructors and even our phone company (the communications specialist).

Every evening on the news we hear of people getting shot after a "violent argument" or about court cases that resulted from something being said, then taken out of context and turned into a libelous act.

On a broader scale, this problem causes wars especially religious ones, like the ones that exist in the Middle East. Those wars have recently caused a $6 million price tag to be placed on Mr. Rushdie's head because someone somewhere had a severe communication problem that spread faster than the wildfires in Yellowstone last summer.

Closer to home, when an attendance policy is set and the students fail to understand why they must obey it, there is a "failure to communicate." (Someday, an instructor is going to make millions on a book of excuses students use.) Students really get imaginative when it comes down to facing their lack of attendance. Despite their true feelings, they submit to the policies and make excuses for not being there.

When the parking administration spends hours and hours every day citing students for violating established parking regulations, again we have "a failure to communicate."

If indeed we didn't have a problem here then there would be no need for a parking appeals board. (Who serves on that board? I'll bet they've probably heard quite a few excuses too.)

What I believe we need to do is do a little bit more listening and a little less talking. Ambiguity lies in the ignorance of facts and guidelines. If you do find yourself in a situation where you've screwed up or been screwed, stop for a minute and listen. Then react with a bit of reason instead of an angry ignorance of what the real problem is.

With spring break upon us, the multitudes of college students that will be assaulting the Florida coastline will, no doubt, be engrossed in a series of "failures to communicate" with the local townfolk and the local police. Last year this communications failure resulted in several riots and a variety of injuries to many people who just wanted to have some fun but were accidentally mistaken for rowdy, drunken collegiate misfits.

If there was an easy solution to this problem of miscommunication the world would be a rather dull place to live (it would also make political campaigns very boring.) If just once during the next few days you stopped to get the facts straight before stating your opinion or before passing judgement on someone maybe you'd avoid an argument or hurt feelings. For a few days, don't assume that what you say is most important. For a few days, watch your words and listen, just listen to others.

Potential Block Voting in SGA Elections Unfair

All the people who registered to run in the upcoming SGA elections should be commended on their willingness to participate in what seems to be a very unpopular forum here at UNCW. It takes time and guts to run in an election, especially at this time of year when it is difficult to balance midterms and extra-curriculars.

We at the Seahawk were watching the election sign-up, and began to notice a curious pattern in the registration. It seems several groups on campus are signing up a member to run in every position open to them (two of the positions, president and vice-president, are open only to those who have had a year or more prior experience in SGA.)

This could easily be misconstrued as an attempt to block vote a particular group into the Student Government, but we are not ready to make accusations.

Basically, it is unfair to the students voting because on the ballot it isn't going to say "Joe Smith is a member of Group XYZ." It is possible that Joe will be readily influenced if elected by the other members of his group who also have a great chance of being elected under the block vote system.

The students need to recognize the likelihood of a 1/4 or 1/2 "Group XYZ" population in the SGA, and is one group equipped to distribute nearly a quarter of a million dollars of student money? (This happened in 1987-88, when there was a hefty Delta Tau Delta population in the Senate.) It becomes a question of who can provide the best representation for a very diverse student population.

It is now the duty of the student body to carefully listen to the campaign platforms and query those running about the strength of their obligation and loyalty to their organizations. We will all be watching to see who's telling the truth.

Thanks to Dr. Kahlia

UNCW owes a debt of gratitude to Dr. Ravi Kahlia, who in the interest of expanding the cultural horizons of the university community invited the Kaul, the Indian Ambassador to the United States to visit UNCW.

Sometimes it seems we have so far to go in keeping up with our sister universities in North Carolina, they have so many notable people speaking everyday, but when we get visitors with as much prestige and importance as Kaul, we know we are on the way up.

Thank you Dr. Kahlia, for taking the time to arrange the Ambassador's visit, and for caring so much about UNCW.

As a recent transfer student, I have been impressed with both the level of instruction and quality of services available at the university. However, I must take exception to a recent editorial comparing the wealth of some students to that of the homeless. Wondering why someone with an expensive car would even attend college implies that future earning power is the only reason to pursue an education, and that if you already have money there is no reason why you should be in school. Coming from a collegiate publication, this is blasphemous!

While feeling sympathy for the homeless is just, right, and necessary, chastizing students for spending money on late night pizza will not help those who are less fortunate. Obtaining an education, then using what has been learned to help the homeless will, however, help their plight. Students spending money are not the cause of our countries current economic situation, and these students did not put the homeless on the streets. They may, however, after graduation, assist in getting them off the streets and into homes and jobs. Let us be glad these kids are in school.

Victoria Jones

EDITOR'S NOTE: Although Chad Adams is Managing Editor, his column is not representative of the editorial opinion of the Seahawk. The opinions expressed in his column are his own, and as a collegiate publication, we encourage freedom of expression. So let us take the opportunity to encourage anyone else who would like to write a column (one-shot deal) to come to the office and discuss their ideas.

We are happy that our columnists create controversy within the student population and that students do write in.

Enjoy A Good Laugh Once In A While

How good it is to laugh and feel the release that laughter brings. It is all too easy to get caught up in taking ourselves and all the heavy issues impinge on our life so seriously that we lose the capacity for humor.

Laughter springs from one of two wellsprings in our lives - pleasure and joy, wellsprings which are quite distinct. Pleasure comes from without; from all that we find in our world that appeals, that gives content to that illusive experience that we call "happiness." Think of all the places you'd like being, people you want to be with, activities that touch your senses of pleasure.

How do you play? When and where does the child in you get loose and "play ball" or "get hugged" or wander in the secret garden of your imaginations? We all like feeling good and spend a good deal of time figuring out with whom and at which point we can move into our environment in such a way that has the best chance of producing pleasure. We seek a career that seeks pleasure. We look for relationships that do the same. Some of us even determine that a certain lifestyle or position in life will bring pleasure and therefore we work to those ends. There's another wellspring of laughter that holds more promise, I believe, it is joy. Joy comes from within, rather than from without. Joy is the happiness of love, a deep inner feeling that can fill our being even in the mists of personal suffering; yep! even when we are in pain. Joy emerges as we live in congruence with our deepest internal values. For me that means living lovingly, or to put it in other terms, to live under the heart of God.

Joy, then, has little to do with our external world measured in terms of lifestyle or affluence of success. It has everything to do with discovering our deepest selves with all our yearnings and strivings, hopes and dreams, fears and frustrations and being true to that Self. If we are true to our God - gifted self, we will know joy even if the outward course of events brings suffering, opposition, or injustice to our lives.

Even if the world seems to conspire to deny us pleasure, we still can live with much joy. I've known many who lack joy and seek frantically to fill that void with the pursuit of pleasure. Much of partying, much of sexual activity seems to have that kind of franticness that speaks clearly a lack of joy. Those others that have discovered the kind of loving that balances the needs of self with the needs of others also discover that a wellspring of joy that, no matter what the external circumstances, allows smiles, a sense of delight, a freedom to appreciate the smallest gifts and insights. We could all move beyond our search for pleasure into the deeper, more sustaining experience of joy.

Life After College With A B.A. In B.S.

Don't you hate being asked, "What are you going to do after college?" Instead of telling the nosy blob that it's none of their business, you give some half-$$$ answer; of course your answer depends on your major. Some of us with a vague major will give a vague reply: "Well, ah, I figure I'll check all of the current ah prospects, and ah, hey, I can do anything-after all, I've learned to communicate."

Yeah, I'm one of these multi-faceted individuals who will receive a degree in "Speech Communications." Or as I affectionately refer to it-I'm receiving a BA in BS.

After I receive this dubious distinction, I'm moving to the other side of the country to avoid the embarrassment of being seen at Tart's wearing a shiny suit and a greasy smile, reciting the line, "Hi, what type of stereo system and/or video equipment can I sell you today-love that tie." Then I would hear, "Hey, aren't you that smart-@! who used to write that obnoxious column in the school paper?" Whos, talk about your nightmares!

That won't be me! No matter what, I will not have a job where I'm kissing @! and ripping people off. I'll leave sales to the money-grubbing slime who give counterfeit million dollar smiles and a hot skewer up the caboose.

I will also not work in P.R. Those people can really put their BA in BS to good use. Except they distort everything they learned. They use their mouth to smile and speak out their @! I'm not interested in being a talking head on the tube either. I'd hate to sit in front of the camera smiling from ear to ear as I report someone else's news. Even worse would be writing it. To hell with facts-I'd rather make them up.

Well then, what can I do? Allow me to sum up everything I've learned so far at UNCW, and go from there. I've learned theories on how humans acquire speech. Did you know that animals can't talk? I've learned little Spanish. "Me gusto Chi Chi's." I've learned dozens of theories on communication. Does the name Kenneth Burke mean anything to you? I've learned all about Socrates. I find it ironic, because I think Socrates would have hated us Comm. majors. We're too much like sophists. (If you don't know what a sophist is, then you're not a Comm. major, and I ain't telling.)

This semester alone, I've learned what soap operas are all about, and Barbie Dolls. I've learned that we live in a sensate society and that we are all selfish scum and should kill ourselves just to get it over with. (That was from an elective.)

I'm actually learning to speak correctly. Nobody ever told me that I suffer from glottal shock. I went my entire life with it, and everyone was too polite to tell me to my face. Now I know what all those kids were chanting in grade school: "You've got glottal shock-You've got glottal shock." I thought that they were referring to my rotten socks.

My favorite classes weren't even in my major; I've enjoyed philosophy classes the most. Being a philosophy major would be even more vague than a Comm. major. At least I'd know why I was unemployed. My major accomplishment has been learning to speak in public without wetting myself. I actually enjoy speaking in public now. How many people can say that? Joining the Forensics team was all it took. It's do or die, and I died. With the combination of the two "Fs", forensics and philosophy, I can now give the illusion that I know what I'm talking about. (Sometimes, I actually do.)

To tell you the truth, I'm much more intelligent than I was prior to starting at UNCW. That's the name of the game-not money. I don't really know what I'll be doing in the future. If I can do this for a living-I've had it made. Can you imagine getting paid to write this?

I figure that I'll be the most intelligent person in the unemployment line. I'll also have the most creative-looking applications and the ability to bore the socks off any prospective employer, while using perfect diction. I could tell the exactly what they want to hear while sporting a large toothy grin. Hey, I've got it! I can go politics!

Who's To Blame If College Is Boring?

ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

When I was in high school, the most-asked question was, "What's there to do?" And likewise the most popular complaint was, "There's nothing to do!" My hometown of Rocky Mount has an approximate population of 40,000 people and, although it's not the Big Apple, it certainly offers an interesting variety of entertainment opportunities. People from surrounding towns flocked into Rocky Mount each weekend to amuse themselves while students from my high school went to Raleigh, Greenville, or Wilson because there was "nothing to do."

Here at UNCW we have an array of entertainment options. Many of us are far away from parental control and now have free reign in choosing who our friends are, how late we will stay out (my personal favorite), and where we will go for entertainment. We can now associate with those individuals that our conservative parents frown upon, whether they have green heads, shaved heads, or no heads. Yet, I still hear those familiar words, "There's nothing to do!"

It seems that UNCW students, like the students in my high school, are waiting for entertainment to fall into their laps. If none of the existing entertainment opportunities appeal to students, does that justify saying there's nothing to do? NO! Why do students feel that the world owes them entertainment? This is not so. Students are responsible for entertaining themselves. It is possible to create amusement for ourselves and others if what is available does not meet personal tastes or standards.

Students' main activities are going to parties and going to movies. It is no wonder that people are bored, they do the same things over and over and over... My next statement may offend people, but I intend to make it anyway because it needs to be said. Bored people are boring people! It takes a creative person to come up with interesting things to do. This article is my personal challenge to UNCW students. I would like to see students more active not only in school affairs, but also in outside activities. Instead of limiting ourselves to parties or movies, we should be trying new and different things as well: plays, clubs, foreign films, art shows, dance performances, the symphony, etc. Some might say these things are boring, but I say doing the same thing over and over again is boring and that students should try something different once in a while.

As entertainment editor for the SEAHAWK, I would like to ask students to let me know what they like to do, what their favorite restaurants are, and where they go for entertainment. Write these things down and bring them to me at the SEAHAWK office. There are a wide variety of things that we can do, let's put our heads together and banish boredom from UNCW campus forever!

Musicians Win Over $60,000 In Music City Song Festival

The Ninth Annual Music City Song Festival recently concluded, and among the winners sharing over $60,000 in cash and prizes are an actress on a popular daytime series and a 12-year-old songwriter.

Cyndi James Gossett, of Malibu, Calif., who portrays officer Lexie Brooks on NBC's "Days of Our Lives," won MCSF awards as a vocalist and songwriter. She earned Second Place in the MOR/Adult Contemporary category of the Vocal Division for her performance of "Lonely Heart," a song she co-wrote with Paul Wright, III, of Reseda Calif. In the Professional Song Division, Gossett and Wright earned Third Place in the MOR/Adult Contemporary category for "Lonely Heart" and Second place in the Pop/Top 40 category with

"I Never Knew Love."

The MCSF will kick off its 1989 competition in May and will be open for entries until the fall. To celebrate its Tenth Anniversary, MCSF will introduce a number of expansions of the competition, including a new Novice classification in the Song and Lyric competitions.

In addition to competing for cash and merchandise awards, all entrants in the Novice Song and Lyric divisions will receive a free professional evaluation of their entry.

"There are a lot of people who write songs and lyrics as a hobby and would like to see how their material rates against industry standards, but they're hesitant to enter our competition," says Roy Sinkovitch, MCSF founder and

Executive Director. "Writers with great potential are going undiscovered and unrecognized because they believe the competition is too stiff. Our new Novice classification is designed especially to help developing writers."

In conjunction with the competition, each summer the MCSF also publishes its free, educational SoundMakers magazine. The publication features informative articles by music industry experts.

To be added to the MCSF mailing list for entry information and a free copy of SoundMakers magazine, write to: MCSF, P.O. Box 17999-W, Nashville, TN 37217 or call (615) 834-0027 between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m. Central Time.

St. John's Museum Features Three North Carolina Artists

St. John's Museum of Art will be showing Black and Light March 9-April 30. The exhibition will include the paintings and sculpture of three North Carolina artists: Eric Lawing, Billy Lee and Kevin Mullins. The three artists are associated with the University of North Carolina at Greensboro where Kevin Mullins and Eric Lawing are Curators of the Weatherspoon Art Gallery, and Billy Lee is an Assistant Professor in the Art Department.

Eric Lawing's black paintings investigate clothing styles as they relate to painting styles. Billy Lee is a sculptor whose wall reliefs and floor pieces deal with spatial relationships. Kevin Mullins' colorful abstract paintings relate to architecture and the Minimalist movement.

There will be a New Members' Welcome and Members' Preview on Thursday, March 9 from 7:00-9:00 p.m. in the Hughes Gallery and a Walk-Through Tour led by the artists at 11:00 a.m. the following morning. John Coffey, Curator of Contemporary Art at the North Carolina Museum of Art, will give a lecture "Current Trends in Contemporary Art" on Thursday, March 30 at 8:00 p.m.

St. John's Museum of Art is open Tuesday through Saturday from 10:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. and Sunday Noon until 4:00 p.m. Admission is free.

UNCW Holds First Summer Arts Festival

(UNCW NEWS) The University of North Carolina at Wilmington department of creative arts will produce its first Summer Arts Festival on the UNCW campus June 1 through July 29, 1989. The festival will consist of jazz, brass and organ concerts, an art exhibit and two theatre productions. "The need to challenge the human spirit does not go away during the summer," says festival producer Dennis Sporre. "Wilmington in the summer comprises more than just the beach." The Summer Arts Festival at UNCW will make that fact even clearer," Sporre said.

An exhibit of East Carolina Printmakers, featuring etchings and other original prints by three members of the art faculty at East Carolina University, will run from June 1 to July 31 in Kenan Hall. On June 9, the festival will officially open with a concert given by Art Blakey, John Coltrane, Wayne Shorter and original student compositions. It will be held in Kenan Auditorium.

June 21 through 25 will feature "Mornings at Seven," by Paul Osborne, a comedy directed by Dr. Terry Rogers in the S.R.O. Theatre in Kenan Hall. On June 22, Dr. Clair Rozier will present an organ recital featuring a variety of compositions from the Baroque period to the twentieth century. Works will include: Variations on a Theme by Paganini, a technically dazzling composition by Thimian-Ball and compositions by Buxtehude, Bach, Vienne and Buck. This will be held in Kenan Auditorium. A brass ensemble, directed by Harry McLamb, will perform on July 14 in Kenan Auditorium. The ensemble, which will range in size from quartets to full brass choir, will feature works from Purcell, Bonelli, Gabrieli, Bach, Henry Mancini and Scott Joplin. The festival will close with a production of "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat," by Andrew Lloyd Webber and Tim Rice. Directed by Frank Trimble and presented in Kenan Auditorium, the musical will run July 27 through 29.

Subscriptions for the entire series are $15.00 each individual tickets are $4.00 and patronships begin at $50.00, in which two tickets are allotted for the entire season and patrons' names are listed in the program. For more information, call (919) 395-3588 or (919) 395-3440.

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington's Summer Arts Festival is a department of creative arts production. "With exception of the art exhibit, the festival features creative arts faculty members from UNCW."

We The Mediocre

By Kelly Holsten

Last weekend I took a road trip up to New York City to rid myself of Wilmington-itis, which is a complete shut down of all sensory input coming from outside a half-mile radius of New Hanover County. When this disease hits, there's no alternative but to Leave, Get out.... Run for your LIFE.

I had a free place to stay on the East Side of Manhattan and 250 dollars to blow on everything from paper Statue of Liberty hats to a plastic replica of a distorted caricature of Mayor Koch's skull.

I also wanted to witness some bands that rarely make it down to North Carolina. Since there are an abundance of clubs, I figured my chances were pretty good in succeeding at this part of the mission. Unfortunately, there were only about FOUR good bands to choose from...and all in one night. The God Bullies, The Cows, Bullet Lavolta, and The Burn were all at CBGB's, down at the West Village. CBGB's was the place where the great 70's bands such as TELEVISION, THE RAMONES, and TALKING HEADS became famous. Of course, now it was just the pale shell of a one-time famous hole-in-the-wall, trying to live on the last dying gasps of a name which had long ago fallen into the gutter of Lost Trivia... (HUH?), I figured that this Saturday night was going to be the time for the Big Come Back...and I WOULD be there.

When Saturday night rolled around, I thought I was ready; unfortunately, the cab driver didn't seem to think so. When I told him my destination, he wondered why I wasn't wearing a CRASH Helmet and sufficient padding. God, was I this far out of my Realm?

Evidently I wasn't, because when I arrived, the place didn't appear to be too different from any other bomb shelter I'd visited. That's why my head rotated on it's axis when I discovered that a bottle of domestic beer cost over three dollars! This put a damper on my evening when I realized I would have to view THE GOD BULLIES while stone sober.

Well, as it turned out, I needed more than a beer to get through 30 minutes of GOD BULLY hell. This gimmick band from Michigan should have called "I WANNA BE IGGY POP." I have never seen such a pathetic rip-off...Within a song and a half, the singer had stripped down to his briefs, tied the mike cord around his neck, rubbed his groin, and beaten a human stage prop with a leather belt! The crowd remained bored and listless; I felt like a vegetable.

Fortunately, they were removed from the stage before the crowd went into Full Riot.

Luckily, THE COWS, from Mimesopolis, came to the relief. This foursome made more noise than a Hoboken factory. The vocalist wore a cowboy hat and played a beaten up BUGLE. The bass player looked as if he'd been in an accident involving a fire hose and a bag of loose change. I'm not quite sure about the guitarist and drummer although I think they might have been closely related to the vocalist. These guys roared through a set that sounded like a trash band with a sense of humor run amok. They finished up with an excellent off-key cover of Summertime Blues with the bugle in place of the vocals. I wanted more.

Unfortunately, what I got was BULLET LAVOLTA. They were supposed to be the highlight of the evening. I had heard their first album and was impressed...but their stuff live sounded too much like a standard high-powered, bar chord, speed rock band.

They played the longest and left me longing for COW NOISE. During this time, my girlfriend had given up on me and LAVOLTA and struck up a conversation with the lead guitarist of SONIC YOUTH, who just happened to be in the audience. My night was rapidly decaying. Where was THE BURN when you needed them?

When THE BURN finally appeared, it was close to 3:30 a.m. Only a few die-hards remained. The band consisted of the former vocalist of SORRY and the rhythm section from PHANTOM TOLLBOOTH. Their music was filled with powerful rhythm changes, stops and starts, and an overall sound that combined the best from both bands. It was poppunk punk with a BRAIN. Look for good things from this line-up in the future.

As for me, I made it home safely without too many wounds. In fact, I'm even looking forward to hearing my girlfriend on the next album from SONIC YOUTH....

Lady Hawks Bow to ECU

BY TASHA ROONE
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

The Lady Seahawks returned from a road trip, with one win and one lost under their belts, February 22. On the 20th the Women's team played the American Lady Eagles losing a close battle 78-74.

The following day the Lady Seahawks were challenged by Maryland Baltimore-County in which they successfully won 100-85. However, the Lady Seahawks did not have much success at home in Trask losing both games to East Carolina 104-57 and UNC Greensboro 92-89.

Early in the game the Lady Seahawks stayed abreast with the Lady Pirates. Tressa Reese hit a three pointer about two minutes into the contest.

With less than twelve minutes left in first half the Hawks fell behind by 10. The Pirates extended their lead to 15 at halftime 32-47.

Rosayin Flood 8 and Denise Bailey 6 were leading Hawks in scoring at the half-way point of the contest.

Coming into the second half, Lady Hawks appeared ready to do battle. However soon they were struggling for breathing room, trying hopelessly to gain an edge over the Pirates.

The Lady Seahawks started playing rather sloppy by committing careless fouls. With thirteen minutes still left in the game, two starting key players, Charlene Page and Reese had four fouls. Christoph looked to the bench and sent Gina Bennett in the game who immediately scores a three pointer to boost the Hawks morale.

However, the game clock shows 7:10 and a 45-80 deficit. At the six minute mark the Lady Seahawks are down by 40, 47-87.

With five minutes left ECU has scored their 90 point; knowing they have the game in the bag they are going for the big 100.

Of course they hit it with a minute on the clock. ECU's fans and bench goes wild. To really send them in a frenzy they score their final two at the buzzer for a final tally of ECU 104-UNCW 57.

Tying for top scorer position was Page and Flood with 10 each. Gina Bennett was right behind with 9. Top rebounder was Kelly Kincaid with 9 and second was Denise Bailey with 7.

Against UNC-Greensboro, the beginning looked promising when Kincaid scores the first two points in the game.

The Lady Hawks are playing good defense and Kincaid is scoring basket after basket. At the eleven minute marker Jennifer Bennett scores two to put Hawks up 24-16, and UNC-G take a time out to re-group.

Kincaid and Reese combination matched basket for basket with UNC-G to keep Hawks ahead.

With Saturday night's lost in their eyes the Lady Seahawks execute play after play. Team work is shown as Flood misses a free throw and Reese rebounds putting it in for two or the successful pass sequence of Kincaid to Bennett and to Page for the lay-up.

Gina throws up a pass from Tracey for an incredible two points. At half-time the Lady Seahawks were winning 52-37.

In opening the second half, Reese scores the first six points for the Lady Seahawks. O.K., it still looks good with baskets by Bailey and Page.

But something happened with only about five minutes left in the game. Those Lady Spartans had crawl back into the contest. A technical free throw against the Hawks result in cutting the Hawk's lead to three points, 86-83. Between 2:00-1:00 minutes it's a one point game.

With 34 secs. remaining we foul. Oh no! Spartans go to the line for a one and one. Both are made it's now 88-90 in their favor. The clock is down to 9 seconds and Page is fouled driving to the basket and sent to the free throw line for two shots with four seconds remaining. She makes only the second one; it's 89-90.

They take it out and the Hawks foul with one seconds to go. At the line both are good, UNC-G wins it in the last seconds 92-89.

IceHawks Lose Again to Black

BY MAI NGUYEN
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

The Icehawks experienced disappointment as they were "snakebitten," in their game against the Black Hockey Team (named for their jerseys). Due to their apparent paralysis early in the game, the Hawks were unable to secure an early lead as they had previously accomplished in their prior game.

The Black Hockey Team, to whom the Hawks only other loss is attributed, displayed flawless technique by penetrating the Hawk's territory repeatedly with a strong offensive front. One of the main strengths of the opposition was their powerful forwards, composed of players who have developed extraordinary rapport over a six year course.

Unfortunately for the Hawks, the referees seemed to rule with an iron fist, calling many cheap penalties. When the Hawks finally scored in the second period, the referees discounted the shot. One of the Hawks had been checked into the opposing goalie's crease (the semicircle around the goalie) by a malcontent foe.

Since the referees did not see the account of roughness on the part of one of the Black Team's players, they ruled against the Hawks.

Another fatal mistake by the Icehawks was made when sophomore Scott Petersen missed an open shot in front of the goalie. This was just one among the five breakaway shots that the Hawks did not capitalize upon.

"It was clearly a lack of not capitalizing on the opportunities that caused our fall," commented co-captain Carl Potter. "It was also a bitter and frustrating loss for us," he continued.

Finally, in the third period with four minutes on the clock, Mike Meron scored to give UNCW its' only goal for the night. Overall, the Hawks performed with a degree less fervent than their usual explosive style. Much credit should be given to the Black Hockey Team whose tough defense and accurate passing won them the 3-1 game.

The referees also seemed to be calling a tighter game, though the penalties were evenly dispersed between the two teams. The Icehawks currently hold a record of 5-2. Next week's game will be postponed until Monday, March 13 when the Hawks will face the Animal Hospital Team. UNCW will also play the Pool Specialists on the 15th of March.

Howard scored 13 of his team-high 21 points in the opening half.

UNCW opened the second half by allowing Kelly to shoot at will, with Brannon Lancaster dropping down to help out on Edwards. Edwards was limited to 13 points over the final period.

ECU closed to within five points with less than six minutes remaining as Edwards stepped in front of a Howard pass and raced downcourt, delivering a thunderous reverse slam dunk which raised the crowd out of their seats.

"Our crowd was fantastic," Edwards said. "They kept us in the game. This is a tough place for a visiting team to play."

Stanley Love hit one free throw to bring the Pirates to within 52-51 with 3:41 remaining.

Larry Houzer then scored four unanswered points to preserve the Seahawks tenth consecutive victory over the arch-rival Pirates.

The Seahawks, who finished 9-5 in the conference now await Lefty Drisell's JMU Dukes in the opening round of the CAA tournament in Hampton, VA.

TEACHING EXCELLENCE AWARD

for excellence in teaching and outstanding services at
The University of North Carolina
at Wilmington

NATURE AND PURPOSE OF THE AWARD

The Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award is designed to exemplify this institution's commitment to teaching excellence. Recipients of the award shall manifest excellence as persons who have made and continue to make significant contributions to higher education through their dedication and service to students.

The $1,500 cash award carries with it both an honor and a responsibility. It will specify a member of the faculty as a person of excellence and it will call upon him or her to share that excellence with colleagues and students.

CRITERIA FOR CONSIDERATION

A nominee for the Teaching Excellence Award must be a current member of the UNCW faculty who has been teaching at least half-time for five semesters or more. The nominee must have demonstrated a mastery of and enthusiasm for the subject taught, restlessness in maintaining high academic standards, a genuine interest in each student's intellectual and creative development, and an ability to foster respect for diverse points of view and an openness to learning.

PROCEDURE FOR NOMINATIONS

Nominations may be submitted by any member of the faculty, currently enrolled students, alumni or persons in the larger community served by the university.

All letters of nomination must be limited to one page and must be received no later than 5:00 p.m. on Friday, March 3, 1989, by the Chancellor's Nomination Committee, Room 114, Alderman Hall, 601 South College Road, Wilmington, North Carolina 28403.

SELECTION PROCESS

The Chancellor, after consultation with the Chairman of the Faculty Senate, will designate members of the Chancellor's Nomination Committee. After reviewing the nominations, the Committee will make its recommendation to the Chancellor. He will present the recipient of the 1989 Board of Trustees Teaching Excellence Award to the Board of Trustees in July 1989.

Bryan Gives 'Rap' The Boot

BY BRUCE ROLEY
STAFF WRITER

The tentative plans to book three rap bands, Kid N' Play, EPMD, and Boogie Down Productions, died on the chopping block when Vice Chancellor Bryan made the final decision to cancel the upcoming concert scheduled for April 8, due to security and safety concerns.

Judgment used by the administration in regards to the concert cancellation touched off a storm of controversy involving several factors.

Questions surrounding the measures needed to carry the three rap acts became an issue when John Meers, concert chairperson for ACE (Association for Campus Entertainment) submitted for approval a security rider, specifying the band's security requirements.

"I first became aware of the security rider on Friday. Once I saw that they were requiring a metal detector, a red flag went up. We've had groups here before and never had any of them demand that we use a metal detector," said Vice Chancellor Bryan.

Joseph Johnson, Director of Public Safety, shared the concerns for the extensive security rider, "This particular security rider was stricter than any I've seen in my fifteen years of work with colleges. We had to take into consideration why this agent was so afraid."

At Bryan's request, an inquiry was made by Chief Johnson to determine any background information regarding schools that had allowed Kid N' Play, EPMD, and Boogie Down Productions to perform.

Schools including the University of Maryland, College Park, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the University of Connecticut, South Carolina University, and Fayetteville State University, all reported alleged incidents of violence or extraordinary security measures during the acts.

"Joe Johnson felt that the security needed for such a concert was greater than the campus could provide. This would mean that he would have to hire outside security," said Bryan.

In evaluating the situation, Chief Johnson determined that a minimum of thirty officers would be necessary to meet the demands of the security rider.

"To effectively secure the coliseum we would have to have our entire force in one location, which would have left serious holes on the campus," replied Chief Johnson.

"We are responsible, as well as liable for the students of this campus. I felt that we were putting ourselves in a very questionable situation," responded Bryan.

After consulting both Chief Johnson and Special Assistant to the Chancellor for Legal Affairs, Paul Eaglin, the final decision to cancel the rap concert was made.

The ramifications of the administration's decision has given rise to a building resentment among many of the student population.

"It made alot of sense to get an act that was either an R&B or rap, for two reasons. These groups can fly into Wilmington from Los Angeles without much difficulty in scheduling. But more importantly, because this kind of show has not yet happened on campus before," said John Meers.

"Even though rap has recieved alot of bad press from incidents in New York and Los Angeles, we have to keep in mind that this is Wilmington. We don't have the degree of gang violence that these other cities do," continued Meers.

The fact that rap music is quickly growing in popularity both on campus and off seems undeniable.

"The record is obvious that the black students have something to complain about, when we've had Foreigner, Heart, Cheap Trick, REM, and practically every country band that is known perform on campus. By booking these rap acts, we were trying to cater to a certain type of audience whose turn had come," replied Meers.

Delthea Simmons, President of the Black Student Union expressed anger towards the decision made by the UNCW administration. "I think they made a rash judgment. You cannot assume just because there is a certain type of music and scattered incidence of violence, that they are necessarily related, or will occur here."

"I wonder if they would have allowed the Who to play here after their incident in Cincinnati?" responded Simmons.

Melissa Hill, a junior at UNCW, also felt that the administration had acted unfairly. "They say it's because of security concerns. I think that they're afraid that another Castle Street incident might occur."

Though most students felt negatively about the cancellation, a few tried to see things from the administration's perspective.

"I think the administration acted as any administration would have in regards to the information that was provided. In respect to the information, I think it was a very one sided, negative viewpoint. You only hear the bad stuff about rap, when in fact there is a very positive message behind the music of many rap artists," said senior, Chris Merridith.

In addition to the anger expressed by many of the black community, there exists a legal

Schweitzer Celebration Begins

RODNEY INGLE
STAFF WRITER

As many people know, the Schweitzer Awards are coming to Wilmington. The recipients will receive their awards next Wednesday March 22nd in Kenan Auditorium.

What UNCW students may not know, is that the schedule of events throughout that week has been designed to give students a chance to meet, talk to, and hear lectures from these recipients and other distinguished guest involved with the Albert Schweitzer Award.

The weeks scheduled events are as follows:
Sunday March 19th there will be a Bach Organ Concert performed by Dr. Clair Rozier, assistant professor of music at UNCW. It will be held at 5 p.m. at Trinity Methodist Church and will feature the churches new organ. The program includes "The Prelude and Fugue in G Major" and "The Fugue in G minor." Admission is free.

Monday March 20th there will be a lecture by Dr. Moshe Amon, philosopher and scholar of Jewish studies in Vancouver, Canada. It will take place at 7:30 p.m. in Cameron Hall Auditorium. Responding to his lecture will be Dr. Robert C. Schultz from the Northwest Theological Union in Seattle. The topic of the lecture will be "A New Ethic for the 1990's"; a rare opportunity for students and the community to review Albert Schweitzer ethical theory.

Also, the Albert Schweitzer Essay Contest Winners will be presented. The first place winner will read the winning essay. The topic for the essay was, "Albert Schweitzer's Influence in the World Today." The program is free of charge.

Tuesday March 21st in Cameron Hall Auditorium there will be a press conference with the three prize winners at 2:30 p.m.

Later that evening at 8 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium there will be a Thalian Hall concert Series presenting a concert in honor of the prize recipients. The program features Roy Weyerhaeuser - pianist, and Nicholas Kitchen - violinist. $8.00 orchestra seats, $6.00 family circle seats. For more information call the Center Box Office at 763-3398.

Wednesday March 22nd is "up close and personal" day. From 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Harold Robles will be in Randall Library to explain his collection of Schweitzer artifacts and memorabilia. There is no charge. Robles is a native of the Netherlands, and founder of the Albert Schweitzer Center. His extensive collection of Albert Schweitzer memorabilia includes such things as various photos of Schweitzer at different stages in life, personal letters to Schweitzer by such people as President John F. Kennedy and Albert Einstein, and one of Schweitzer's organs that he used to play in Lambarne Africa.

Also from 10 - 11:45 a.m. students can meet and speak with the prize recipients in the following University Union Rooms, Dr. Boris Luban-Plozza - Room 207, and a very special mystery guest - Room 207 (Quiet Lounge).

From 12 - 1:30 p.m. students are invited to a luncheon with the prize recipients (as long as space and

Awareness Festival Forming

KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

UNCW is catching up to the awareness trend that is taking place across the nation. Students, Brenda Boyle, Jeff Hinkle, and Denny Best have taken the initiative and created the idea for 'Awareness Festival '89' and are urging other students to get involved.

The festival, which is being sponsored by the Campus Awareness Organization (CAO), will bring a wide variety of organizations, musical entertainment, foods, and crafts to the UNCW campus April 8-9 on the Residence Life Gazebo field.

Besides the entertainment, those attending will be able to gain awareness about various social and environmental issues that are of local and national concern.

"Unless we are aware of what's going on around us, even if we have the potential [to change things], ...unless you know about it, there's really nothing we can do. That's where awareness comes in," said Jeff Hinkle, junior English major and co-founder of CAO.

Many local chapters of organizations will be present to promote awareness on these environmental and social issues including Greenpeace.

All participants will be invited to look into these clubs, collect the literature on them, and decide if they would like to become a member, or in some cases, do volunteer work.

"The festival will attempt to make students aware of all of the opportunities within their community that they can help with in making the community a better place," said Hinkle.

Hinkle said that college students tend to be separated from the community as far as getting involved in and taking responsibility for it. Thus, he and the other members of CAO

Conflict of Interest Leads to Veto

RICK HEYMANN
STAFF WRITER

A "conflict of interests" caused Karla Alston, President of the SGA, to veto the new club funding proposal written and submitted by the Budget and Planning Committee, a committee led by Senator Lee Barnhill.

The veto that Alston cast was simply an objection to only one section of the proposal, specifically, the section dealing with the $700 funding limit to all academic clubs.

She comments, "I don't feel there should be any stipulations on academic clubs, because we [here at UNCW] are academically oriented. Furthermore, academic clubs can not get extra funding from their respective academic departments as was previously thought by the SGA."

Barnhill, who was instrumental in creating these regulations, was not completely disappointed by Alston's veto.

"It took a lot of guts for her to enforce her opinion with a veto. She obviously feels strongly about academic club funding and that is why we are willing to compromise," he said.

Since the President of the SGA does not have the power of a line-item veto, the entire bill had to be sent back to the committee for revision.

The proposal was introduced by Senator Lee Barnhill to the SGA three weeks ago with hopes to "increase the efficiency of the allocation process in the Senate," said Barnhill.

He added, "In a nutshell, the proposal was designed to cut funding of all political and religious clubs. Also, we added a $700 ceiling to all academic clubs."

Since Alston's veto, the Budget and Planning Committee has compromised with Alston and subsequently removed section "C", the academic funding stipulation.

On Monday, March 14, Barnhill introduced the revised proposal to the Senate.

"Unfortunately, by the time the bill was to be voted on, some Senators had left the meeting early and quorum had been broken," he said.

Therefore, the proposal will have to wait yet another week until it comes before the Senate again.

"There is almost no doubt in my mind that the revised bill will pass, just because the Senate had passed it before," said both Barnhill and Alston.

Robert Smith, Vice-President of the SGA, seemed optimistic about the new proposal.

"This proposal will provide the SGA with a much smoother allocation period this Spring. Instead of lengthy debates in the Senate concerning the amount of funds that a club will get, the new bill will eliminate the red tape and finally present a set of greatly needed guidelines for us to follow."

Smith commented that there existed a budgeting "fiasco" last year that demanded the immediate attention of the Budget and Finance Committee.

"For example, one club, the MBA Association, received a $200 account before they were even a registered organization. I can only blame the poor organization of last year's allocation period for such incompetence," said Smith.

Housing Fair Successful

BY CELESTE E. BULLEY
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Although it is common for UNCW students to complain about housing problems at here at school, it cannot be said the administration hasn't recognized some of those complaints. On March 1, the first UNCW Housing Fair was held in room 100 of the Union, and over 400 students took the opportunity to avoid extra apartment hunting by visiting 16 local apartment complex representatives under one roof.

Coordinated by the Dean of Students Office, "this opportunity [was] provided for students to personally talk with apartment managers and help students learn to make well informed decisions about off-campus living," explains Jacqueline Skinner, assistant dean of students.

The representatives brought applications and brochures of apartment features, costs and floor plans, so students could compare complex benefits.

Charlie Maimone, associate dean of students/residence life, feels the comparison was one of the best things about the fair. "Things like this make the apartments more competitive. Students become a more precious commodity and the complexes have to entice the individual."

"It puts a competitive edge on the search for housing, and helps the apartment managers see students as consumers."

Maimone felt the Housing Fair was much needed. "When we are only housing 1600 out of 6500 students, on-campus housing is important, but it's not enough."

According to Skinner, attendance by the invited apartments was good, with only eight of the twenty-four complexes invited not attending. Although most of the complexes are located near the campus, she comments, "the apartments farther away really wanted to take the opportunity to talk to a large number of students, instead of waiting for them to come out there. All the apartment managers were pleased with the Fair."

Present at the fair as well were representatives from the Housing Office, providing information on off-campus meal plans and on-campus lottery. "So the Housing Fair was really not just about off campus living, it was about all your housing options," Skinner says.

Maimone feels it is a step in the direction of greater attention for who he calls 'quasi commuters'. "This is a group of students, usually freshmen and sophomores who live in the apartment complexes immediately around the campus who need greater attention than they have been receiving," he says. "This program links the Dean of Students office with off campus concerns and issues."

"We want to make students more informed about off-campus living and what their rights and responsibilities are as tenants in the community, and are hoping to benefit community relations with the University," says Skinner.

"We want them to see that we care and are trying to make our students more aware."

complication involving a contract dispute. The cost to book the three bands would have been in the neighborhood of $18,000 if the deal were finalized.

"Actual contracts have not been signed, however a verbal agreement was made between ACE and the managing agents, and in this business a verbal agreement is almost as binding as a written agreement," said Meers.

"We could very well still have to pay for this concert, even though it has been cancelled. Everything is being handled by Paul Eaglin now. I'm not even allowed to talk to anyone associated with the agency," continued Meers.

Paul Eaglin was unavailable for any comment.

The final consequence of the administration's decision affects John Meers. By pulling out of the contract, his credibility is in jeopardy with future agents.

"The whole thing seems like a bad business practice. John Meers put a lot of time and effort into planning this event. It seems unfair to take it all away from him like they did," responded Delthea Simmons.

Meers showed concern for what kind of damage may have inadvertently been done to his future reputation.

Festival Offers Environmental Insight

GREG GERRANS
STAFF WRITER

Discere Aude is the school's motto which translates "Dare to Know." Because of the hardwork of a hand full of individuals, Awareness Festival '89 will allow the campus populace to do just that.

"Awareness Festival '89" will allow students to gain a better insight into problems and solutions facing today's world. Such serious topics as environmental concerns will be dealt with.

Because there are some major problems pertaining to the environment that need looking at, the festival is designed to enhance a person's knowledge of the problems assaulting earth. It is expected to network campus and community concerns. Without a campus response; however, this will be futile.

"The biggest headache in doing this is the lack of response from within the UNCW system. It's really disheartening to see so much apathy," said Boyle.

Should pollution, carbon dioxide build up, and apathy continue along their present course, the problems of global warming will reach epic proportions.

To successfully overcome the environmental problems we are facing, people must know what is going on.

Such big names as The Sierra Club, Society for Preservation of Masonboro, Greenpeace and Keep America Beautiful are slated to be on hand to answer questions and provide information. Having these clubs available is expected to bring community participation.

"We sent letters to faculty, various clubs, the Greeks and others. The response is nil. We hope that everyone will join in and work together from faculty on down," stated Boyle. She went on to challenge those groups to get involved and be a part of festival '89.

"We can use all the help we can get from making banners to just participating.

With so much hard work and support from outside sources the festival promises to enlightening as well as entertaining. The organizers

"I had a verbal approval on all my ends. I told them everything was set to go, we had our budget worked out, and then the administration pulled the rug out from beneath me. What I'm left with is an agent waiting on the other side, who is no longer getting calls from me anymore, and wanting to know why," commented Meers.

"It really makes me look like I'm lying, like I only thought I could see the whole transaction pushed through," continued Meers.

Bryan expressed concern for any harm the administration might have unintentionally committed.

"We never intended to hurt John's reputation or his career with future agents, however the handling of this issue has become an administrative affair. The issue was being put in a legal arena and we felt that it would be best for Paul Eaglin to handle it," said Bryan.

The decision by the administration is final according to Bryan.

"I think in the future that the most appropriate procedure to take is to set up a committee of experts in every area necessary, so problems can be discussed well in advance and solutions worked out," said Bryan.

are raising awareness of problematic situations which merit study. The best part of all of this is that they are doing so in an entertaining manner.

Too often people have been scared off from environmental problems by either apathy or labeling those concerned with the environment as "hippies."

No longer are just the "hip" tuned into global warming and pollution. These catastrophic events which will effect everyone from the highest "yuppie" to the lowly "journalist." Every aspect of the future will be tainted by environmental problems.

If you've ever complained of being bored or if your tired of just drinking the weekends away or if you want to know more about the plight of Mother Earth check out Awareness Festival '89. It's free, fun and best of all it allows you to discere aude.

Parker Named Educator Of The Year

BY PATRICE BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

Ralph Parker, Director of Minority Affairs at UNCW, was recently selected as Educator of the Year by the New Hanover County Human Relations Commission. Parker chuckled over the message which was sent to his office by the Hampton Inn hotel in Chapel Hill.

Parker responsibilities include accompanying the UNCW gospel choir on its annual tour, making hotel and bus arrangements, as well as recruiting minority students at the various cities they visit.

The hotel praises the UNCW Gospel Choir, which stayed there last week, for being one of the most well-behaved groups to stay at that establishment.

Parker said, "They probably say that to all the groups [that stay there]."

Handling the gospel choir's tour is only one of several projects Parker is involved in in his attempt to "build bridges between the races, not only on campus, but between the campus and the greater Wilmington community as well," according to Chancellor William H. Wagoner.

Wagoner, who nominated Parker for the award, did so because, he said, "as counselor, friend, mentor, and good, Mr. Parker advises, cajoles, inspires, and supports Black students, helping them with study habits, bills paying, housing and adapting to and dealing with the complexities of university life."

"At the same time he sensitizes and clarifies for the University community what it means to be Black in a traditionally white setting," according to Wagoner.

The Office of Minority Affairs offers programs on AIDS awareness, academic tutoring, and special interests geared toward minority students to raise that "comfort level" Parker said Black students need on a predominantly white campus.

When Parker attended the 5th annual New Hanover County Human Relations Month banquet held February 26th on a Saturday evening, he was on the program to present the award for Student of the Year. Ironically, it was he who was named Educator of the Year.

Parker said he was "carried away, elated at being nominated, but to emerge as a recipient is exciting professionally."

Theo McClammy, Community Relations Specialist on the NHC Human Relations Commission, explained how recipients are nominated by anyone in the community, then judged by a review panel.

McClammy said the criteria of the awards is "recognition of those individuals who go above and beyond the call of duty to promote good race relations and are [good] influences in their respective professional and personal arenas."

Sophomore Alicia Worrell, business manager for the gospel choir, feels that Parker deserved the award because "he has always looked out for the choir. Whenever we need assistance, he gets the job done every time."

Worrell said Parker deals with (minority) students on a one to one basis, looking out for them academically and encouraging them. "He acts more like a friend, and usually knows everyone by name," said Worrell.

Smiling, Parker said "you work hard and wonder if anyone's paying attention, [but] the work is reward within itself."

have urged campus organizations to get involved.

Brenda Boyle, president of CAO said that they have been inviting student organizations to vend healthy foods, relevant t-shirts, and other such items.

"Organizations of special interest and non-profit pursuit are invited to display their purpose and directions in booth space. Fraternities and sororities are invited to show their dedication to the improvement of the environment and the enhancement of community unity via banners and artwork," said Boyle.

Hinkle said that the only student organizations that have shown an interest in participating thus far are Association for Campus Entertainment, Black Student Union, and Alpha Phi Omega.

Denny Best said that one of the main reasons he and the others started CAO and the Awareness Festival is to get students involved.

"Sponsorship is crucial to this endeavor," said Boyle.

Anyone willing to participate in the festival, marshal the area, or house visiting guests should contact Boyle at 791-4481.

"American" Becoming Un-American?

In this country it seems that there is a new wind blowing that I believe to be at least a little un-American. When I hear someone refer to themselves as a Japanese-American I usually know before they have to announce it to me. There are times that I'm a little bit fuzzy as to whether some people are Korean-Americans or Chinese-Americans, but I'm sure that it makes little difference in the grand scheme of things; they are, in essence, Americans.

Whether your lineage is of Antarctica or Iceland, if you are a citizen of the U.S., you are an American.

I've been in the process of tracing my roots for several years now (it's not that hard when you're looking for names like Adams, Wright, Sanders, Belk, Bullock and Williams). I have even found out that my lineage runs unwaveringly toward that Anglican group of islands off the coast of France.

I debated briefly upon calling myself an English-American and even pondered the idea of starting a movement towards establishing a group of English-Americans. There could be a National Organization for English-Americans and it could be joined by others like the National Not So English-Americans or the ever more diverse group of National Slightly English-Americans. Then those groups could hold a conference once every five or six years with the other national American groups.

The problem with this train of thought is that eventually we are going to wonder what the hell an American is. When you mention the word American to a foreigner they usually couldn't describe how one would look. Most of the time they describe how someone acts. If on the other hand we were to try and describe a Mexican it would be much easier to fill in certain physical traits.

With the pursuance of these ancestral national identities I wonder if there will ever come a time when America will risk losing its own identity.

Personally, I like the fact that within our own boundaries can be found the most diverse people on the face of the Earth. If you are an African-American or German-

American matters little, when and if you travel abroad your passport will read "citizen of the United States of America" and that makes you an American and one entitled to all the rights promised you under its constitution.

Editorials

Until UNCW Students Care, Seahawk Can't Endorse

It is customary for student newspapers to endorse candidates in Student Government elections, and many people wonder why the Seahawk does not honor this tradition. The reason is linked to the period from 1986 to early 1988 when Jefferson Weaver was Editor-in-Chief and engaged in battle with the SGA president of the time, Lee King.

Weaver resigned after misplacing forty-some thousand dollars of student money, and the SGA remained reasonably mistrustful of what is the current Seahawk administration. If the student newspaper was to survive, the straight and narrow path was to be followed until the end of the Spring '88 semester. We were not in a position to take sides, lest the partisan factions of the SGA were to feel slighted if their candidate did not win, and harass the paper throughout the following school year.

The reason is not exactly the same this year, but it's definitely related to the above. After fighting many battles over content and money this year, but approaching the end of the year with an account that is in the black, we can candidly opine that the Media needs to be out from under SGA control.

Why would any media endorse a candidate and risk losing support for the following year? (No, that is not a comment on the integrity of the candidates; it's a comment on the convoluted, sad way our SGA is organized, and the real possibility that certain people who crave power might reach beyond the limit of their position and try to influence the media's content.)

Until UNCW, both students and administration, cares enough about the Media to remove us from direct Student Government control, and help to develop programs and courses to ensure a smooth transition of power (Editorships/Managerships) from year to year, the Seahawk can only afford to be slightly bold and innovative, and cannot afford to endorse candidates.

Bad Rap Given to Administration

John Meers and John Freer are to be commended for their efforts in trying to bring new and innovative forms of entertainment to UNCW. For the first time in UNCW's history the efforts of their office have been brought to a screeching halt by the intervention of a higher authority, the administration.

Pending the possibility that the Rap groups contracted by ACE will cause incidences of violence and pose a security threat, Vice-Chancellor Bryan, looking out for the student's best interests, cancelled the concert outright.

Freer and Meers are left out in the cold with their credibility at stake and $18,000 of student activity fees left hanging in the legal turmoil that such a cancellation can bring.

The plans for any form of a spring concert have at this time been cancelled and will probably stay that way, but it is worth mentioning that both Freer and Meers worked hard to bring the students something that had never been brought to UNCW. The students should be aware that there are indeed people working to try and bring entertainment to UNCW, and for now the fault of not having any rest with the administration and not with the University Program Board.

The Other Side
By Rick Cairns
Life, The Universe and Rick's Answers

It's amazing how everyone seems to be so unhappy. Look around you. How many happy looking people do you see? This is supposedly the best country on Earth. What the hell is going on?

It's difficult to comprehend why so many college students are so miserable. This is supposed to be the best time of your life. Most students walk around as though they just heard that Gerald knows their innermost thoughts. Woody Allen was right when he said, "There are two kinds of people: crippled or deformed people with dreadful lives, and the rest of us -- the miserable." Be thankful if you're one of the miserable people.

I can't count how many times a day I hear, "I'm so tired." Well, wake the fuck up! I'm not going to preach about how good you have it and about poor people or "the time that I was crying because I had no shoes until I saw a man with no car." No, that crap gets old. I admit that it's too easy to dwell on the current problems in your life.

But, are they really problems?

What problems do college students have? Well let's see. Maybe your car won't start, so you have to hitch a ride to the party. Three tests next week and a paper due yesterday.

You're bummed because you know that you won't get all of your work done and everyone thinks that you're ugly and fat and not worth a damn, and you want to kill yourself. TRIVIAL. Get a hold of yourself. (Hey, that always cheers me up for a few minutes.)

Now, here's some good, free advice. Write this down. No, it's already written. Cut this out. Unless it isn't printed, then write it down. But if it isn't printed, how can you read it? I'm not sure what you should do, but if you are reading this, then pay attention; this will be on the test. (You think that you have problems.) Where was I? Oh yeah, my free advice.

Here is how to get along in life and be happy (without doing drugs). It works. Do you ever see ME moping around campus? No. OK, where was I. Yeah, how to be happy. Let me tell you a little story. When I was in the Navy, I couldn't wait to get out because everything was bullshit. (No word sums it up better, if this says BS, that means it was censored, because I really wrote bullshit. I don't mind if it's censored because I don't want to piss off any more campus employees.) OK, I couldn't wait to get out because everything was BS. A year after I was out of the Navy, I realized that nothing changed. It was still BS.

There you have it. You heard it here first. Drum roll please. Life is BS. Once you accept that, then you can walk around a happy person. You may think, "Boy what a bad attitude." Go ahead and think it. I don't care, because it's BS. If I have a bad attitude, why am I the one who is never depressed and tired and bitching and moaning about tests and papers and work and my shorts being too tight. Huh? I don't care if people think that I'm weird and/or ugly. That's their problem.

I know that it isn't poetic or anything, but it's the best theory that I've ever heard about life. Once you stop taking yourself and life too seriously--life takes on a new meaning. You become a happier person. People will notice this about you, and good things will happen.

If you're healthy, you've got it made. Everything else is just materialistic crap. It might be difficult to take advice from a smart-ass who writes for a cheap school newspaper, and had a difficult time putting his thoughts together in this column, and sometimes writes mega-long sentences, but hell, who is to say that's not right? Would you prefer advice from Ann Landers or her sister? Does your Mom and Dad really know what's good for you? They just want you to make them proud. (So they can brag about you making so much money.) But me, I don't even know who the hell you are. I have no ulterior motives. I just know that you're probably one of the unhappy masses who I see shuffling around campus. I'm just trying to lighten you up. I know that it's pretty tough to lighten up when you live in the bible belt, but give it a try.

So, next time you find yourself depressed. Remember, it's all bullshit. If you have tests and papers due and your roommate's partying his or her brains out. You know what you've got to do--so do it. Get the school work done and it will be your time to party the next week. You'll get your day in the sun.

Put this column in your pipe and smoke it!

Letters

To All Students,

I am an American-Armenian student currently attending Rutgers University in New Jersey. As I begin the new semester, I can't help but wonder how the students in Armenia feel. Most, if not all of the students have lost loved ones and friends and many have been injured, some permanently. In addition, most of the universities in the area have been completely destroyed. It is estimated that 88 schools were leveled within 3 minutes on the day the earthquake hit.

None of us could have predicted or prevented the earthquake. However, we can help to rebuild shattered lives. In particular, I am appealing to the students of American universities to help ease the pain of the students in Armenia. I am asking that we as students organize fundraising events for the specific purpose of rebuilding the schools and universities.

Funds can be raised in many different ways. Booths can be set up in the student center and dances, concerts, and other student activities can be held for the specific purpose of aiding the victims of the earthquake. Students can even organize a neighborhood campaign to raise money.

Since the earthquake, I have been actively involved in relief efforts, organized by the Armenian General Benevolent Union (the "AGBU"). The AGBU, established in 1906, is the largest Armenian philanthropic organization in the world. The AGBU created the Armenia Aid program. The AGBU Board of Directors has pledged to spend 100% of all monies raised to aid the victims in Armenia. Donations earmarked for a specific purpose will be used only for that purpose. Therefore, all monies raised by students in American universities, which are earmarked for the purpose of rebuilding the schools and universities, will be used only for that purpose.

The AGBU will attempt to provide speakers to you and your student group if requested. In addition, the AGBU would be happy to discuss ways in which your student groups can help and provide you information about the fundraising activities of other schools in your area. Posters advertising the plight of the Armenians have been printed and are available upon request. Please feel free to call Alex Markarian, Chairman of the AGBU Armenia Aid Fundraising Committee at his office at (212) 221-5730, for further information about the organization or any other questions you may have about the Armenia Aid Program.

The cost to rebuild the shattered region in Armenia and the lives of those affected is too large for any one nation to bear alone. The Armenians need our assistance. As the new semester begins with all the hope surrounding it, let us think about our fellow students in Armenia who now have no schools to attend and who have questions rather than hope surrounding their future. Please help. Thank you.

Donations should be sent to AGBU Armenia Aid, 585 Saddle River Road, Saddle Brook, New Jersey 07662 (201) 797-6000 or 1-800-282-9877.

These accidents could happen to any one of us! The medical bills of any catastrophic illness or accident could just about BANKRUPT any student and/or their parents.

Perhaps it is time to examine the issue of why so much ($41-$46 of our student fees go to pay a private contract with Wilmington Health Associates.

Would you like your money to go to private doctors, which you may see for aspirin, or would you rather have the money go toward a GROUP Major Medical Policy which will cover your bills if you are seriously hurt or ill? Perhaps this is money "WISELY SPENT."

The Policy could be available to all students, and upon graduation we could have the policy transferred to alumni for a "personal health policy."

Barnhill, Humphries; Head To Head

BY CHAD ADAMS
MANAGING EDITOR

With the advent of the SGA spring elections at hand, each of the presidential candidates were given the chance to respond to certain questions. We (at The Seahawk) felt that these questions would be relevant to the student's interest and provide a means by which the student populace as a whole could read, first hand, about the candidates that will oversee the SGA, which is responsible for the allocation of over $250,000 of student fees (Your Money).

What do you think will be the most difficult task you'll face should you become SGA President?

Barnhill: The most difficult task facing the new president would have to be the refocusing of SGA from an organization of internal bickering to one that meets the needs of the students.

Humphries: I would like to make them realize their full potential. They don't realize how much power they have and what kind of influence they have on the student populace.

What do you feel are the main issues that the students are concerned with in relation to SGA?

Barnhill: I think that the students are concerned with their current food service. I believe that there is a strong need for a better variety of entertainment (concerts, shows, comedians, etc.) for it's students. I, furthermore, believe that the students should be provided with a good newspaper in order to be aware of campus activities and news.

Humphries: Your average student is concerned with things that concern him: library hours, cafe food if you live on campus, and residence life activities field. We don't have large number of students living on campus whereas we have large percentage of students who commute everyday and it's not fair that they can't use the residence life activity field like someone who lives on campus can.

What do you feel are the major difference between you and your opponent?

Barnhill: The main difference between my opponent and myself is, whereas, I have stayed in the senate and become chairman of committees, president pro tempore of the senate, SGA speaker of the year, and voiced my opinions on things that affect the student body, Jim has sat silent. Jim has been stressing what's wrong with SGA and I want to stress what SGA can do for the students. I think students are sick and tired of hearing how bad SGA is internally. I think they want to hear more about what services SGA can provide for them, what kind of new ideas and innovations can we come up with.

Humphries: Lee is a very knowledgeable person and he knows what he's talking about, but I do too and whereas he has dealt with one specific area of campus, I've dealt with a much broader spectrum.

Lee knows SGA policy, but when it comes to helping the student, which is what the future president is going to need to do or want to do, Lee may not be aware of where to direct someone. In other words, he may not be completely aware of the resources available to the students. My approach is more humanistic in trying to make the group better and in turn make the whole environment better.

How do you feel that the students view the SGA and why?

Barnhill: It's a negative perception, because the SGA has focused primarily on internal affairs like amending the constitution. Discussing issues that are pertinent to the student body as a whole has come up on only two or three occasions and I want to do that more.

Lee Barnhill

services available through the SGA and providing them with adequate coverage of their meetings through the student newspaper will help insure that the student populace will be aware of all that happens in the SGA.

Humphries: I think this whole campaign has done a lot to spark an interest in student government. Foremost I feel

Jim Humphries

Humphries: I've talked to so many students before I decided to run and most don't know or are not aware of what the SGA does and in that respect they don't want to get involved.

How do you propose to get student interest in the SGA to rise?

Barnhill: If you're doing the things that the SGA should be doing such as providing services, allocating their money fairly and making sure that the student's voice is being heard in the administration, then the students are going to know that SGA affects them.

Providing the students with printed material on the

that the debate was a major attribute to the campaign, as I believe that it has never been done and helped get student interest up. I definitely feel that there will be a higher turnout this year because interest is on the rise. The way to keep student interest up is to stay in constant contact with the students, via mass mailings, telephone and written surveys and having individual senators fill out an objective sheet so that the senator can write out his/her objectives and then work toward those goals.

The SGA president is responsible for appointing several key positions in the SGA.

How do you propose to fill those appointments?

Barnhill: I'm going to open up those appointments to an application process. With this process I would send applications to chairmen of relevant departments for evaluation in order to get the most competent students for the jobs at hand. Students who want to voice the student populace's opinions, because the number one priority of student government is to make sure that no decision is made by the university without the student's voice.

Humphries: A good leader is always going to appoint people that are competent, honest and have integrity. I was considering setting up a committee through SGA to interview and look over applications to see what each applicant has to offer with the committee being comprised of senators from the freshman, sophomore, junior and senior classes. The goal in appointments is to surround yourself with qualified people.

In the past year there has been a heightened push for the media publications (The Seahawk, the Fledgling, Atlantis and WLOZ) to be funded direct without the involvement of the SGA to insure that these services will continue. How do you propose to insure this continuity?

Barnhill: We need to establish some way to ensure that the medias can be funded fairly and still be controlled by students, but not necessarily through the budgetary process of SGA. I'm all for finding alternative means to fund the medias, but my main priority is to make sure that it is the students who are doing that and not the administration.

Humphries: I feel that a percentage of the student fees should go directly to the medias. Some people disagree with this standpoint saying that certain organizations might get out of hand like Jefferson Weaver did with the Seahawk last year, but with an effective media publications board there would be effective medias under its direction. There is, at minimum, a need to explore the different possibilities for funding these organizations.

Final Comment:
Barnhill: I think now is the time for dramatic changes and with bold innovative leadership we can make sure that the future of SGA will be in our hands and that we can control it so we can capture the future instead of letting the future capture us.

Humphries: If you see something that you don't like, don't be afraid to try and change it. You'll never know unless you try. If something's affecting you it's got to be affecting someone else, find out who those people are and join together because there is power in numbers.

"Sammy and Rosie Get Laid"

(CPS) -- After weeks of debate and protest, students at the University of North Dakota will be able to watch "Sammy and Rosie Get Laid" after all.

Student President David Gleissner vetoed a student government ban on the film Feb. 5, clearing the way for the movie to be shown Feb. 23.

The UND Student Senate voted 9-8 Jan. 28 to prohibit the University Program Council from showing the movie because, although they had not seen the film, many felt the title would offend North Dakotans and spur the state legislature to cut funding to the school.

"I want UND to appear as an innovator, not as a negative institution," said Student Senator Steve Martin, who supported the ban.

While the title of the film has put some booking agents at commercial and college theaters alike, the film's distributor said UND's was the most heated debate over the movie so far.

"There have been people who chose not to book it," said Wayne Salazar of Cinecom, the New York-based distributor of "Sammy and Rosie Get Laid."

"This doesn't surprise me at all," Salazar said of the controversy at North Dakota. "As the country becomes more conservative, so do the children that are doing the programming. Still, it is surprising that the student body is so up in arms about the film. This is a level of extremity I haven't seen before."

Students protested the ban almost immediately.

Although the "Sammy and Rosie Get Laid" does include some sex scenes, critics of the ban argued the film's message is political and the title is British slang for being taken advantage of by an institution.

"I'm repulsed by censorship in any form and not have it the reason I'm here," said UND student Robert Zieska during a protest against the ban. "It's insulting to our intelligence."

When Gleissner vetoed the ban, however, the debate surrounding the film died almost as quickly as it started.

"I feel we talked about it, discussed it with the senators, and the lines of communication between us and the senators were good," said University Program Council Chairman John Hitchcock.

"Students have the right to see the movie and not have it be judged by its name. They can choose whether to see it or not," Hitchcock added. "The things UPC deals with are more controversial than the Senate wants to deal with."

"The function of college cinema," said Salazar, "is to expose people to different cultures and different points of view."

"We want to bring to UND student things from outside North Dakota," said Hitchcock, "different perspectives of the world around us."

Annual Snowball Fight Banned

(CPS) -- The presidents of Amherst College and the University of Massachusetts have joined forces to condemn an annual snowball fight that nearly blinded a student in one eye earlier this winter.

The two school leaders released a statement Feb. 23 blasting the Dec. 14 snowball fight even as Amherst prepared to sue its neighbor, UMass for building damages and medical costs incurred by the injured student, freshman Gary Gonya.

"The freshman student had to undergo emergency surgery to save an eye. In light of this incident, it has become clear to us that we can no longer tolerate the continuation of this tradition," Amherst President Peter R. Pouncey and UMass Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said in the statement.

Pouncey estimated students in the snowball fights had caused more than $10,000 in damages to Amherst buildings during the last several years.

And although some might think snowball fights are a flaky issue, they've been a cause for concern at other campuses as well. A Dec. 14 snowball fight between Greeks and dorm residents at the University of Idaho, for example, caused almost $5,000 worth of damages to residence halls and an unknown amount of damages to fraternity houses.

Idaho officials considered raising housing fees to pay for the damage, but now say they'll dip into money they had planned to use for dorm improvements.

Snowball fights also have led to injuries, arrests and damages at other schools in recent years, including Mankato State University in Minnesota and the University of Nebraska.

Amherst's Pouncey and UMass's Duffey promised to counter the annual snowball fight by educating "our students about the dangers of this event and...plan other measures to deter students from participating."

Amherst spokeswoman Terry Allen said it was unclear what other measures will be taken. She said police have been unable to identify Gonya's assailants from videotapes of the snowball fight.

The fights usually erupt during the first significant snowfall of the year. UMass students march to the Amherst campus a mile away to engage the battle.

Amherst will seek a preliminary injunction to allow campus and town police to arrest anyone found instigating a snowball fight at the school, spokesman Douglas Wilson said.

Duffey and Pouncey say the violence escalated as students began packing snowballs with rocks that broke several windows. Gonya, who may have been hit with a snow-covered stone, spent five days in hospitals. Doctors say his vision is blurry, but he will regain sight in a few months.

In 1987, UMass paid more than $3,000 to Amherst College for damages from that year's snowball fight. The college claims UMass still owes $1,788 from last year's attack.

Stanford U. Tries To Get Jokes On-Line

(CPS) -- More than 100 Stanford University students, faculty members and alumni have signed an electronic petition asking to get their jokes back on-line.

The school purged a long, ongoing joke file, which included humor that some people found offensive, from several university computers Feb. 1.

But the protesters, led by computer science Prof. John McCarthy, argued that removing a joke computer file is the same kind of censorship as removing an offensive book from the library.

"We regard this as analogous to removing a book from the library. To be able to read anything subject only to cost limitations is an essential part of academic freedom," the statement said.

"For this reason...we consider it contrary to the function of the university to censor (material) in university computers," the petition stated.

The University of Washington considered a similar move last year when Prof. David Mudge complained some jokes on the university's computer bulletin board had "sexual, personal and racial violence" themes.

But instead of censoring the jokes on the computer bulletin board, Washington officials created separate computer "rooms" for students who can't resist such humor.

The Stanford file, containing more than 900 jokes, originated in Waterloo, Ontario, and is sent to computers across North America electronically, one of hundreds of files called "news groups." The file costs nothing to receive and very little to store.

The file is run by computer software company owner Brad Templeton, who decides which jokes to include. Templeton usually encrypts any jokes that might be offensive, requiring anyone who wishes to read the jokes to decode them first.

The controversy over the files began when a Jewish student at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology complained that a joke Templeton accidentally had not encrypted was anti-Semitic.

McCarthy says the file then was brought to the attention of John Sack, director of Stanford's Data Center, who ultimately zapped the file although no formal protest was made.

"However the matter gurgled through the Stanford computer bureaucracy, the uppers reaches of the Stanford administration and the Stanford legal counsel," McCarthy said. "The matter was kept confidential among these officials for no reason that was made explicit. Perhaps it was just habit."

Sack and Academic Information Resources director Ralph Gorin decided to purge the file Feb. 1. Computer users continue to receive new jokes by signing on to off-campus computers.

McCarthy said deleting the file cost several hours of programmer time "by people who have no particular taste for this job."

College Athletics: Crime On The Rise

(CPS) -- FBI agents arrested University of Oklahoma quarterback Charles Thompson Feb. 14, charging him with selling cocaine and, in the process, climaxing another round of arrests of college athletes nationwide.

FBI officials suggested "other players" both at OU and an impressive cross-section of other campuses have been making crime headlines frequently in recent months.

Just four days before Thompson was arrested, local officials charged three other OU players with gang raping a 20-year-old woman in the athletic dorm Jan. 20.

At about the same time, University of Colorado football player Marcus Reliford turned himself in to police to face a series of burglary and rape charges.

In the prior six weeks, two other former CU players had been charged in sex assault cases. During the last 17 months, some 14 CU athletes have been arrested.

Such incidents haven't been confined to big sports powers.

In late January, two St. Bonaventure University basketball players were arrested on burglary charges. During fall term, Virginia police nabbed a George Mason University soccer player for assaulting another student in a campus apartment, while in Pennsylvania former Millersville State University basketball star Amos Clay was sentenced to two-to-seven years in prison for a series of "home invasions" near campus.

In September, a Mississippi State University football player was shot during a series of running confrontations, otherwise punctuated by beatings, with fraternity members.

Similarly, four University of Southern California football players were arrested in January, 1988, during a riot at the premiere of the Eddie Murphy film "Raw." One man was shot to death and another stabbed during the melee.

A week later, the El Monte, Calif., district attorney announced he would charge another USC player with felony kidnapping.

And in his August, 1988, book, former University of Oklahoma linebacker Brian Bosworth reported has teammates often freebased cocaine and described a 1984 snowball fight that ended when receiver Buster Rhymes fired "about 150 rounds out of an Uzi machine gun" off and apartment balcony.

"If you were a star on the University of Oklahoma football team," Bosworth wrote, "you could do just about anything you wanted. You had no rules."

Athletes at the universities of Nebraska, Maryland, Texas, El Paso, Texas-Austin, Idaho, Iowa and New Mexico State University, among others, also have been arrested for a variety of assaults during the last 12 months.

At the University of Minnesota during 1988 three football players were evicted from their dorm room for allegedly torturing and killing animals in their rooms, while another teammate was arrested for allegedly selling sex to female football fans.

Campus Endowments Grew In '88

(CPS) -- Campus endowments -- those collections of investments that earn the money that colleges use for buildings, scholarships and even salaries -- grew by only 1.3 percent in the 1988 fiscal year, far less than the previous year's 13.9 return, a nationwide accounting released Feb. 13 figured.

But the National Association of College and University Business Officers (NACUBO) says that's not bad, considering that the October, 1987, stock market crash happened in the middle of the period.

NACUBO's annual endowment study also found the value of the investments of the 315 schools it surveyed rose to a collective $49.3 billion during fiscal year 1988, which began July 1, 1987 and ended June 30, 1988. That's up almost $2 billion from fiscal year 1987's $47.9 billion.

Such numbers are important because endowment income is one of the main sources colleges tap -- the others being government grants and research contracts, student tuition gifts, state appropriations, and whatever revenues can be squeezed out of marketing research findings and logos -- for money.

Some schools managed to earn as much as 17 percent on their endowments, while others saw their returns fall by as much as 14 percent.

By far, the school with the largest endowment by the end of the fiscal year 1988 was Harvard University, which boasts a $4.1 billion endowment. The University of Texas system was second, with a $2.3 billion endowment. Princeton University followed with a $2.3 billion endowment.

Raising Recycling Awareness Growing More Important

BY CAROL TREMBLAY
STAFF WRITER

Lately it seems as if an army of green alien boxes are planning a strategic attack on our campus drink machines. Contrary to this belief, they are really there to serve as agents of a recycling program on the campus called "Operation Reincarnation" sponsored by (EVS).

Programs such as this one are trying to raise the awareness and consciousness of students in order to get them involved in recycling.

Because waste disposal is becoming an increasingly alarming problem happening and what can be done to relieve this problem.

Although UNCW is not in any immediate danger of being bombed by a half-million tons of trash, it is probable that if people don't act soon, this whole nation could become one large landfill within the next couple hundred years. We won't have to face this problem, but is this what we really want for our future generations?

Ellen Metzger, a professor in the Environmental Studies department, says that "this is a problem that's existed a long time." In the 70's, recycling was very popular and many acted to help. "The difference in the 80's is that it's getting scary," says Metzger.

The major events that brought our attention back to environmental issues are the droughts caused by excessive pollution, decisions on nuclear waste disposal sites, and the medical waste products washing up on our beaches.

One society dedicated to recycling and environment preservation is Keep America Beautiful.

Nancy Pritchett, the Executive Director of the New Hanover County branch for KAB, says their main objective is to "get people enthusiastic about recycling." They also try to encourage congressmen and officials to begin building incinerators to recycle reusable products. But she adds that it is difficult to get this done because it's a "matter of priorities," and our problem is not so severe as to give any immediate action.

Pritchett says that "the payback is not going to overcome the cost of substances, it makes you think twice about chucking that pile of newspapers into the dumpster. (Also take into consideration that 14 percent of the volume of a landfill is made up of newspaper!)

"Beach Sweep" is designed to rid the beaches of trash that has washed up. The main contributors to this waste are commercial fishermen and Navy ships. It is a fact that about one pound of garbage per person is heaved into the sea by these litterbugs each day.

This trash kills many fish, birds, and other sea critters when they mistake it for food. They may consume plastic bags, fishing line, or styrofoam bits. They could swim through six-pack connectors and strangle

Department of Transportation, someone pledges to clean a two mile stretch of road at least four times a year. Clubs, fraternities, major companies, restaurants, individuals, etc. have already chosen to participate. Because these signs also give these people some free advertising, they are encouraged to clean up more often if their road is frequented by more trash.

David Helig, a senior Parks and Recreation major, says that he is already involved in recycling at his home in Chapel Hill. Helig says that his family has separate bags to put glass, paper, and aluminum. By recycling, "the trash doesn't end up on the streets. It can be made into something else," says Helig.

Melody Walker, a sophomore English major, thinks that "it's great that we're showing some interest. I wouldn't like for it to be required, but we need to be encouraged."

The areas around us that have already begun recycling are Charlotte, Jacksonville, Chapel Hill, and even NC State University.

So far, these programs seem to be helping. Wilmington has a number of groups participating in "desk-top" recycling, where a box houses discarded letters, memos, etc. that will be recycled; schools are getting involved all over the county with newspaper collection booths; and in May, a massive collection of old telephone directories for recycling will be underway.

Other items that may be recycled are green and brown glass bottles, plastics, cardboard, tires and paper products. Individual recyclers around town will specify what they will accept.

(Making it easier for people to recycle also plays a vital part in this story. Metzger says that "if we educate the public and facilitate people by having centrally located pick up centers," recycling could be put into effect quicker.

Recycling is a hot issue. It is important that we begin taking note of this problem now, before it gets out of hand. Wilmington's local landfill has only 10 years of space left in it. After that, alternative measures will be critical.

Pritchett adds that "once we realize what we are doing and what is happening to our country," the idea of recycling will be hard to ignore.

Making it easier for people to recycle also plays a vital part in this story...

recycling." The setback of recycling is that it is not profitable, which is probably what is causing this seemingly lack of concern. It takes a lot of money to build the facilities to recycle the various materials, and there is no tangible return for the company that provides this service.

The environmental return, however, is tremendous. For every ton of paper recycled, we have saved the lives of 17 trees. This may not seem a great feat, but when you think that trees also control air pollution, prevent massive soil erosion, and protect much of our water from harmful themselves to death. Anything tossed into the ocean can cause an unnecessary fatality of our wildlife.

The ultimate goal of the Beach Sweep program is to clean the beaches from Maine to Florida-all in one day. Each person participating will keep a ledger of everything they pick up, then a record of what they found will be compiled into a final report.

But beaches are not the only problem areas in the nation. Our highways are dotted with cups, diapers, bags, boxes, you name it.

Adopt-a-highway" is geared toward ridding our roads of this problem. Sponsored by the food availability permit). They will be in the following rooms: Beverly Sills - Room 100, Dr. George Hitchings - Room W of Hawks Nest, and Dr. Boris Luban-Plozza - Room U of the Hawks Nest.

At 8 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium the ceremony will take place. There will be a video presentation entitled, "Albert Schweitzer: Yesterday's Man for Today's World," music by Dr. Claire Rozier, the UNCW Brass Ensemble, and the UNCW Gospel Choir. There is no charge and the public is invited.

Dr. George Herbert Hitchings will receive the 1989 Albert Schweitzer International Prize for Medicine. The Award will be presented by Dr. Paul Talalay, distinguished professor from John Hopkins University.

Professor Dr. Boris Luban-Plozza will receive the 1989 Prize for Humanities. The award will be presented by Roland L. Quillet, Swiss vice consul general representing the Consul General of Switzerland.

Beverly Sills will receive the 1989 Prize for Music. It will be awarded by Maria Fisher, chair of the Beethoven Society.

Phil Keaggy and Randy Stonehill Play Kenan

ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

On Thursday, March 2 a benefit concert was held in Kenan Auditorium to help needy children in Haiti. The Association for Campus Entertainment (formerly UPB), Campus Crusade for Christ, and various area youth groups were the sponsors. The artists performing in this benefit were Randy Stonehill and Phil Keaggy along with British comedians Phil and John. Stonehill and Keaggy are very big names in the Christian music world, so it was not surprising that a very large crowd stood eagerly in the rain before the doors were finally opened.

British comedy team Phil and John opened the concert. These two are big performers at colleges and universities in England. Not only were these guys funny, they turned out to be talented musicians as well. Each brought a guitar on stage and delighted the audience with lots of folksy songs including "The Boxer" by Simon and Garfunkle. They joked that this song tends to get them the most money when they play on the street, so they tended to play it every other song. They only played it once on Thursday night, however.

Phil and John's comedy routine was hilarious. How do I know? I always use my roommate, Tina, to measure hilarity. If she laughs, then it's funny. But when she has convulsions and an entire row of seats shakes, then it's hilarious. These guys are able to get an entire auditorium laughing with just a look.

Phil and John performed for about twenty minutes and then my favorite artist IN THE WHOLE WORLD walked on stage. Randy Stonehill opened up with his hit "The Gods of Men" and I was in rock and roll heaven. His next song was another of his hits "Cosmetic Fixation." This song is a humorous statement about society's obsession with status.

Randy next performed a new one called "Christmas at Denny's" which he wrote at Christmas. The song has beautiful lyrics that make the listener identify immediately with the plight of homeless individuals. Stonehill says, "There is only a thin line of cash between the average person and the homeless person." He maintains that homeless people are not criminals. They are merely people who have suffered a set back or calamity of some sort.

When Randy was stuck in an airport in New York on his way to Norway watching the rain leak through the roof, he wrote "Shut De Do" which was ideal for audience participation. He joked that it was time to "sing along with Uncle Rand."

It was a blast!

Randy calls the mutual friendship between himself and Phil Keaggy a "mutual fan club." They wrote a song together called "Sunday's Child" which is a simple, happy song about God changing lives. It is clear that both men have a special relationship with the God they believe in. They don't attempt to cram their religion down anyone's throat, they just sing about something that means a lot to them personally. It is enjoyable to listen to, no matter what beliefs the listener holds (or doesn't hold as the case may be).

For those reading who may not know, Phil Keaggy is a world-renowned guitarist who is considered to be one of the best in the world. For those reading who do know, Phil Keaggy is not dead, his music just doesn't get the wide-spread play it once did (when he was with the band Glass Harp in the late 60's) because of its Christian theme. It is a shame that more people don't get to hear the man named by Jimi Hendrix as the best guitarist in the world. Keaggy is phenomenal!!!

I don't know how to describe Keaggy's playing. He left me speechless. It's like Star Trek with strings, he goes where no man has gone before! The audience was flabbergasted. I wonder how many people there realized that the man is missing the middle finger on his right hand. They really would have been shocked if they knew. By the way, he lost it in an accident, not in a duel with Hendrix.

Keaggy was joined on stage after his solo set by Randy Stonehill. Together they performed the song "Tell Me How You Feel" which got great audience response. To close the show they did "Blessed Be the Times" which Keaggy wrote with British artist Steve Taylor.

After the show, I was granted an exclusive interview with Keaggy and Stonehill. The one thing that really impressed me about the two was their humility. If Jimi Hendrix called ME the best guitarist in the world, believe me it would be common knowledge because I'd tell EVERYBODY. But, Phil (thank God) is not like me, he didn't care for compliments or adoration. He just likes to play good music.

In order to get the interview, I had to promise to keep it brief because the guys were tired from the road and Randy was sick with the flu. I therefore limited myself to a couple of big questions. I was intensely interested in learning about Compassion International, the recipient of half the concert's proceeds.

Both artists have travelled with Compassion International and have seen the ugliness of poverty first-hand, for example, orphans searching through garbage heaps for food. Compassion will use the money from the concert to provide food, clothes, and medical care for 2 or 3 children in Haiti for an entire year.

Randy and Phil both agree that Compassion International is the best organization out of the many that provide assistance for the needy children of the world. They state that the organization is in the business of "putting their Christianity where their mouth is." The organization works to enable people in need to help themselves, so that the dignity of the person is kept intact.

As I intimated earlier, I am always one to boast, so I will close by letting it be known that I got hugged by Uncle Rand. And Phil Keaggy put his arm around me. My blue and white button-down may never see the washer again. Eat your heart out!!!!

Movie Review

MOVIE REVIEW ALLEN RAY

TWINS-4 STARS.

Arnold Schwarzenegger and Danny DeVito - Twins? Sound odd? Well, it is, kinda. But most of all, it's hilarious. If you haven't seen Twins yet, go before its gone. Arnie and Kanny play twins that were separated at birth. Arnold was raised on a tropical island by a professor who taught him nine languages, science, history, and of course Karate. Danny on the other hand, was raised as an orphan and grew up to be a con-man. When Arnold finds out that he has a twin, he sets out to find his brother and then his mother. What follows is very interesting, funny, fast, and Arnie only takes off his shirt six or seven times. Go see this movie or Arnie will be back.

Dream a Little Dream-1 STAR. If you know which one of these two young stars is Cory Feldman and which is Cory Haim, then you will love this movie. If you don't know or don't care (like me), then you should find Dream a Little Dream as confusing and boring as I did. This movie was filmed here in Wilmington and I found myself going "Oh, I've been there" a lot and that was the most interesting part of the movie. If you only miss one movie this year, make it this one.

THE BURBS-2 STARS.

The Burbs opened to the biggest box office gross for a first weekend in movie history due to the popularity of its star Tom Hanks. However, box office sales have been off since then because of one reason, this is a bad movie. There was an occasional funny scene or expression on Tom Hanks's face, but not enough to fill this long, confusing, and often boring movie. By the way, Cory Feldman was in The Burbs also and I finally figured out which one he was. I'm as big a Tom Hanks fan as they come, but even Tom wasn't enough to save The Burbs.

The Ben Friedman Band (formerly I.B.M) will play at the Mad Monk on Thursday, March 23. The band consists of guitarist Kerry Elliott, bassist Tom Saari, drummer Frank Farr, and lead singer/songwriter Ben Friedman

Dr. Libby Promotes Safe Sex at Daytona

(Press Release) It's time for some good news about sex. For a third gala year, sexologist and sociologist Dr. Roger Libby has proclaimed the first week of Spring (March 20-27) to be National Orgasm Week—a sexual rite of Spring.

The first day of Spring is traditionally when a youthful person's fancy turns to love. Libby advises adding a few dashes of lust and laughter.

Assisted by Roxanne Ribbit, his five-foot, six inch voice activated soft sculpture frog (horny toad), Libby will return, Daytona Beach to celebrate orgasms during Spring Break '89 in March. The dynamic duo will appear at Finky's Nightclub March 16-27 to promote safe sexual pleasure. He will hand out condoms donated by Ansell, Inc.

and PrePair Lubricants with nonoxonyl 9 donated by Trimensa Corporation. Pins and T-shirts which exclaim "I Came for National Orgasm Week" and "Just Say Yes to Safe Sex" will be available at a modest price at Finky's in Daytona Beach.

Libby has taught and researched human sexuality at the University of Georgia, Syracuse University and the University of Massachusetts. He is an invited member of the prestigious International Academy of Sex Research, a Fellow of the Society for the Scientific Study of Sex, and he is certified as a sexologist by The American College of Sexologists. Libby is the author or editor of four books and thirty articles in professional and popular publications.

Libby's popular college lectures balance sexual problems with caring, pleasure and humor. Roxanne symbolizes the good things about sex. She is relaxed, fun, assertive and independent. She dresses like a sexy co-ed in a mini-skirt and the T-shirt of each college visited.

Libby argues that sexual desire and caring flourish in spite of media-fueled heterosexual AIDS paranoia. He stresses that orgasms are healthy, and he supports "safe sex" -- conducting a "pre-sex interview" (demonstrated with his frog!), and using a latex condom and nonoxonyl 9 in a lubricant, foam or jelly.

National Orgasm Week is devoted to orgasms through self-pleasuring and with sexual partners.

Plantation Has Fest

WILMINGTON -- Poplar Grove is one of the oldest peanut plantations in the south dating back to 1795. March is National Peanut Month. In honor of this Poplar Grove will hold the 5th Annual Peanut Festival March 18, 10 a.m. - 4 p.m. Admission is $4 adults, $2 - children, children under six admitted free.

This year's festival is expected to be better than ever with gates opening at 10:30 a.m. Hayrides will begin at 10:30 a.m. with a wagon leaving every hour. While waiting for the next wagon you can view the antique car exhibit or peruse old-fashioned craft demonstrations at the village of the Past located in the barn.

The judging of a Peanut Recipe Contest will take place at 11 a.m. in the barn with $50 going to the best recipe in each category of dessert and main dish. When you become hungry from looking at all that food you can satisfy your appetite with a hot dog or bowl of chili.

Entertainment Opportunities

The UNCW Department of Creative Arts presents a Choral Concert at Kenan Auditorium on the UNCW campus Friday, March 17. The performance will begin at 8:00 p.m. and admission is free and open to the public.

On Monday, March 20 the UNCW Department of Creative Arts will present a Band Concert at 8:00 p.m. at Kenan Auditorium on UNCW campus. Admission is $3 and students are free with I.D.

Writing Contests Are Sponsored

(Press Release) The UNCW Creative Writing Program is sponsoring The Jessie Rehder Short Story Awards. To enter students should submit one short story at least 10 pages in length, typed, double-spaced and include a cover sheet with their name, address, phone number, and the title of the story. The deadline is Monday, March 27, 5:00 p.m. The stories should be submitted to Professor Fort's mailbox, Creative Writing Program, Morton Hall. The prizes are $50, $30, and $20 for first, second, and third places respectively.

The University Poetry Awards are also being sponsored. Students wishing to enter should submit up to 3 poems, typed, double-spaced along with a cover sheet with their name, address, phone number, and the titles of the poems. The deadline for the poetry contest is also Monday, March 27, 5:00 p.m. and entries should be submitted to Professor Fort's mailbox as well. There will be prizes of $50, $30, and $20 for the top three entries.

We The Mediocre

By Kelly Holsten

WE THE MEDIOCRE IS TAKING A WEEK LONG VACATION DUE TO MENTAL, MARITAL, PHYSICAL, AND FOCAL PROBLEMS CAUSED BY A NUMBER OF CIRCUMSTANCES BEST LEFT UNTOUCHED.

CONSEQUENTLY, MR. HOLSTEN HAS SUFFERED A SLIGHT BREAKDOWN OF THE CENTRAL NERVOUS SYSTEM. RUMOR HAS IT THAT HIS HIGH STRUNG CUBAN GIRLFRIEND HAS THREATENED DIVORCE AND CRIMINAL LAWSUIT FOR HOLSTEN'S USE OF SLANDER IN THE PAST FEW ARTICLES.

OTHER PROBLEMS COULD STEM FROM THE FACT THAT MR. HOLSTEN HAS BEEN VIRTUALLY UNEMPLOYED FOR CLOSE TO TWO YEARS. EVIDENTLY, LIFE AS A COMPLETE BUM AND SOCIAL OUTCAST HAS BEGUN TO FRAY THE NERVES OF EVERYONE INVOLVED. INCLUDING HOLSTEN, GRADUATE SCHOOL STILL REMAINS THE ONLY SIGN OF HOPE IN WHAT APPEARS TO BE A NEVER-ENDING DOWNWARD SPIRAL TOWARDS THE PIT OF DOOM.

A SERIOUS JOB DOES NOT SEEM TO BE A VIABLE

ALTERNATIVE AS NONE HAVE SHOWN UP ON HOLSTEN'S DOORSTEP. HE HAS PURPORTEDLY BEEN WAITING FOR A SIGN FROM GOD IN THE FORM OF A SUITCASE FULL OF TEN'S AND TWENTY'S DEPOSITED IN HIS NAME AT THE STATE EMPLOYEE'S CREDIT UNION. HOPEFULLY, THINGS WILL BE ON AN UPWARD SWING BY NEXT WEEK'S DEAD LINE. IF SO, LOOK FOR AN ACCOUNT ON THE THURSDAY NIGHT MASSACRE AT FRONT STREET NEWS.

Lady Hawks Are Ousted From CAA Tournament

BY TASHA ROONE
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

Before Spring Break the Lady Seahawks played a tight game against the Lady 49ers of UNC-Charlotte on Friday, March 3. The game was quite exciting and the Lady Seahawks came out of the game with a win 76-71.

The game had not yet started when a presentation of a rose was made to Rosalyn Flood, a lone senior on the team this year. This was Flood's last home game. (Sorry to see you go Roz).

Charlene Page opened the game with the first two points for UNC-W. Flood made an impressive steal for another Hawk's two points early into the game to put us up 5-4. Flood redeemed herself for missing two free throws, stole the ball from the Lady 49ers as they were taking the ball out and lays it up for two cool points. It's a back and forth scoring session with Page and Reese trading buckets. First Page takes the baseline for two 19-19, then Reese takes the long jumper and it's 21-21. With 2:25 left in the game Page catches a half court pass by Gina Bennett which she lays up for a score of 25-23. Only nineteen seconds left in the game and Jennifer Bennett made both free throws for a half-time score of 33-32. It was an exciting first half, yet second half would be anyone's game.

Second half opened up with Jennifer Bennett hitting for two 35-32. The game clock showed 18:57 when Page was foul. Page made the first free throw. As soon as the basket went in, the announcer announced that Page had hit her 1,000 point of her basketball career here at UNC-W. Confused, Page went to the side line with the expression of "Hey, what's going on?" on her face. She was presented with a rose, the game ball, a well-deserved hug from Coach Marilyn Christoph and of course a big round of applause followed by a standing ovation. (Congratulations Char!)

basket after basket. Page laying the ball up for two points, is fouled, and sinks the free throw for the three point play at 11:54. Between the times of 6:36 and 1:00 three Hawks fouled out at crucial crunch time of the contest. The Lady 49ers did themselves in by constantly sending the Hawks to the line in the last four minutes of the game. Reese went to the line for a one-and-one with only two minutes left and a tied score. She missed the first basket, but she got her own rebound and put it up for two 68-66.

A technical foul called on 49ers coach gave the Hawks a chance to create a four point edge. All were made by Page for a score of 72-67. With only twenty-four seconds left on the clock and slim Hawk lead, 72-71; the 49ers call a time out to put together a strategy. Back on the court Gina Bennett was fouled twice at the fourteen and seven seconds mark to make the winning points for the Lady Seahawks 76-71.

Page hit her career high of 31 points, and Reese was second with 22. Page was also the top rebounder and Kelly Kincaid came in second.

The Women's 88-89 basketball season was wound up March 9 during the CAA Women's Tournament at William and Mary Hall in Williamsburg, VA. UNC-W played a hard game against George Mason in the First Round of the tournament. However, they lost 76-63. The Lady Seahawks ended up with a 13-12 overall record. James Madison took the trophy home by beating out Richmond for the CAA Championship title.

Tressa Reese was top scorer hitting her career high of 26 points, which included six three pointers. Page was second hitting 14 and was also top rebounder.

The Lady Seahawks can still be proud. As a result of all Charlene Page's hard work and the help of her team members throughout the season, she made the All-Defense team and the First CAA team.

Thus Women's basketball finally draws to a close for this season.

Career-ending injuries for sports writers.

Hawk Swimmers Finish Season at Easterns

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS WRITER

The Natatorium is now quiet, not a single ripple in the water. The UNCW Seahawks have hung up their swimming goggles and caps for another year. The swimming season is officially over.

The season ended on a cold snowy day in Cleveland, Ohio. The men had stroked their way to a tenth place finish out of the 12 teams at the Eastern Collegiate Swimming Championships.

Our swimmers shattered five school records and four freshman marks in what was described by Coach Dave Allen as, "Our best swimming performance all year."

Nick Revelas and Brad Kinkema led the way for the Hawksters by breaking all four freshman's records. Nick set marks in the 100 free and the 100 fly. His time of 1:08:34 in the 100 fly eclipsed the oldest school mark in Seahawk's Swimming history. All-American Sam O'Leary mark, set in 1979, had been unchallenged for a decade until Revelas ended its reign with his best time ever in the event. "I was disappointed on not qualifying for the Senior Nationals but overall I was happy with my accomplishments," said Revelas. Meanwhile Kinkema set new records in the 100 and 200 breaststroke.

Five school marks were set in the relay races and 100 free. The records in the 200 and 400 free and 200 and 400 medley relay all fell that night in Ohio and every Hawk swimmer qualified for the finals in their events. However the strong swimming programs of powerhouses like West Virginia, Notre Dame, Villanova, and St Bonaventure were too much for them to overcome their tenth place finish.

"It was the toughest competition we faced all year. It was a very fast meet," said swimmer Tim White. Coach Dave Allen was pleased with the Hawk's performances and extended praises to those individuals who swam multiple events.

"A lot of the guys had to swim in three and four events and they were really tired out at the end of the competition." Now with the season over Coach Allen looks to the recruiting and spring practice session aspects of the swimming program.

This is the first spring swimming session ever initiated in the Seahawk swimming program. "We are trying to give the people the opportunity to improve themselves. We need to be more serious in the swimming program than just 6 months of the year," said an enthused Coach Allen. The Hawks will weight train for three days and work in the pool on the remaining two. "The main swimming area we will work on is flip turns and relay exchanges. Our goals are to finish in the top 3 (CAA Championships) and the top 5 (Easterns) for the men and the top 5 and 7 for the women."

On the UNCW recruiting all Coach Allen would say was that he hopes to pick up 8-10 men and 4-5 women and the future looks promising. Although the talents of seniors Phillippe Roth and Mari Mucci will sorely be missed, Coach Allen hopes the Juniors will step up and take a leadership role.

The crowds have stopped screaming, the long practice hours are now behind them, and the Hawks have finished another successful swimming season here at UNCW.

Holt Leads Lady Hawk Runners

BY STAFF REPORTS

The men's and women's track and field team continued improving their times this season by posting numerous life time bests and establishing 9 new school records. The Lady Seahawks were led by sophomore Beth Holt who won the 3,000 meter run in a P.R. and new school record time of 10:59.1. Lalonnie Walker showed big improvement to finish 2nd in a personal best time of 11:37.1. On the men's side, Don Scott gave the spectators the best race of the day in the 800 m as he finished second in a strong field with a new school record of 1:59.3.

Way Out In
(W)right
FieldChris Wright
Sports EditorLessons Learned
From Hampton

I am writing this from my hotel room in Hampton, Va. because one, I need to provide my editors some sort of evidence to justify my all expense paid vacation was indeed a wise investment, and two because it's too damn cold to do much of anything else.

I am not the only one busy at work. There are five of us, recuperating in our "hawk's nest" if you will, from tonight's victory over Richmond.

Signs are already being prepared declaring UNCW as the 1989 CAA Champions. There are similar signs in the George Mason headquarters, to be sure.

The clock reads 2:42: that's a.m. As each minute passes, the slogans begin to make more and more sense.

I can still hear the cheerleaders. Their voices, echoing throughout our second floor are a bit scratchy, but prominent nonetheless.

The alumni we've met this week have been incredible. Their school spirit and generosity is greatly appreciated and will be remembered.

Tonight's game against Richmond was a culmination of everyone's efforts. So called "experts" will label the Hawks 59-56 victory an upset.

Not so.

We were clearly the better squad. Our two second team All-Conference performers, Larry Houzer and Antonio Howard showed the two underserving guys who beat them out for first team honors, Winiacki and Atkinson respectively, just exactly how this game is supposed to be played.

Scores of unknown fans alien to UNCW came up to me afterwards and complimented both our team effort and the support of the crowd, who midway through the second half began to fill the coliseum with chants of "NIT!", directed obviously in the direction of coach Tarrant and his Spider's.

This was my first CAA tournament, and in keeping with tournament tradition, more enjoyment was found outside the coliseum than within its friendly confines.

I was relatively surprised at the alarming number of empty seats. I realize this doesn't yet have the flavor nor tradition of the ACC tourney, but I was still disappointed in the lack of overall support.

In addition to seeing Elvis and touring the "new" Hip Pocket (a redesigned clothing outlet), viewing the Greater Chesapeake Area, courtesy of an ignorant hotel clerk with foul directions in search of a nightclub, was memorable.

While on this tour, I learned several invaluable lessons from a buddy of mine who works in the field. That's the jargon we reporters like to use to refer to a fellow media member.

Women who approach your car at a curbside spotlight dressed in a little less than a teddy could not care less about your opinions on whether Blue Edwards will be a first round pick in the upcoming NBA draft.

I gathered from our conversation that these women were unemployed. They kept mentioning something about some job for $10.00.

Who paid for the pseudo-Richmond pep band, and more importantly, why?

Was a seat reserved for Elvis, and if so, why did I only see him at Benignities?

Quote of the tournament: Lefty's reply to a reporter's question as to whether or not his JMU team was mentally prepared for the UNCW game. "Ah, you know me, I don't get into that mental stuff. I just like to play basketball."

Who exactly was George Mason? and what significant role did he play in the settlement of our country?

Never trust an out-of-state hotel clerk who seems hell-bent on providing you with instructions to the "hottest night spot in town."

Just wondering. Do you think the street women do their "job" in the same hotel we got our directions from? How else could you explain that the first sign of civilian life we encountered after forty miles of traveling were these three helpful women?

A Free continental breakfast simply implies you eat yesterday's left-over doughnuts from Krispy Kreme.

The secret to successful wake up calls is reserving it in your neighbors room number. That way, you wake up to a dull scream rather than the annoying ring of your phone.

People you previously detested are tolerable with each increasing dose of alcohol.

At 3:47 a.m. after a good night's worth of celebrating, columns, such as this, make a tremendous amount of sense.

Hawks Fall in Tourney Final 78-72

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

Hampton, Va. The one thing that UNCW could ill-afford to occur, did just that in Monday night's championship game of the CAA tournament in Hampton, Va. when the Hawk's battled George Mason for the right to appear in the NCAA tournament.

The previous night, following the Hawk's 59-56 triumph over top-seed Richmond, head coach Robert McPherson warned his troops about George Mason's Kenny Sanders.

"We can't afford to let (Sanders) control the game," McPherson said. "He's capable of dominating the game at any time. We've been fortunate in the prior two games. We've done a nice job of containing him."

Sanders, last year's player-of-the-year, who failed to reach his average of 22 points per game during the two regular season games, atoned in dramatic fashion for his final CAA performance scoring 19 points and clearing a tournament-high 19 rebounds, while leading Mason to a 78-72 overtime victory that sealed the Patriots first-ever post-season appearance.

"He's a great, great player," said Larry Houzer. "He's their 'gato' guy in the clutch. We just didn't hit the boards tonight."

George Mason outrebounded UNCW 39-29.

Sanders, named the tournament's MVP, got the Patriots off to a quick start, scoring six of their first eight points as they opened up a 12-4 lead midway through the opening half.

Larry Houzer and Antonio Howard, both named to the All-Tournament team, combined to score 23 of the Seahawk's 29 first half points as they gained a 29-25 halftime advantage.

Houzer closed out his collegiate career by scoring 29 points while Howard added 23 in his final Seahawk performance.

"We're going to miss these two guys," McPherson said, referring to the duo. "The important thing is that they went out in style. It would have been different if they would have only scored six points. They have absolutely nothing to be ashamed of."

Patriot guard Steve Smith, whose three-pointer at the buzzer beat the Seahawks at Fairfax, Va., nailed another crucial jumper with time running down in regulation to help push the game into overtime.

"He did the same thing in (up there)," Howard said. "He threw a head fake and was wide open. I still tried to contest the shot as much as I could."

Houzer forced the overtime by hitting a short turnaround jumper with seven seconds left, tying the score at 61-61.

"I knew they needed me tonight," Houzer said. "I gave it my all. The last play I just tried to post up and get good position. Luckily the shot fell."

Mason connected on two three-pointers in the extra period to claim their first-ever CAA title.

The Patriots placed all five starters in double figures, paced by Sanders' 19.

UNCW, making it's third appearance in the tournament final, finished the season with a 16-14 record.

March Madness Claims the First Crop of Victims

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Attention, Attention all non-sporting fans beware of March Madness that is starting to reach the epidemic level across the continental United States. If not treated it could cause uncontrollable fits of anger, sobbing, anguish, and pain.

This is a strange sickness that comes around every year in early March that afflicts any true sports fanatic, but is especially contagious to the Basketball Junkies. You know the type; he or she is the one with the radio transistor or pocket T.V. always on them. The ones who's favorite T.V. channel is ESPN, favorite saying "What's the Score", and their favorite announcer is (Gak!) Dick Vitale. A night on the town is only possible if they can record the game on their new VCR. They live for basketball, to play it, to watch it, and to worship it.

The disease attacks without warning as the tightly contested conference races start to heat up in the last week of the season. This is only to wet the appetites of their hapless victims. Then the Post-tournaments hit the scene full-force causing the junkies to yearn for more and more basketball.

They are seen glued to their T.V. pushers refusing to miss one second, one free throw, one three point buzzer beater that thrust a virtual unknown into the "Big Dance". They can't seem to get enough of the power teams in the ACC, Big Ten, Pac 10, and Big 8. They are hooked at the weeks end and have now cross the lines of sanity and reason. Their into the hard stuff now, the NIT and NCAA are the only concerns in their life.

Then the disease starts to tighten its grip on its helpless victim. The junkie terminology becomes slurred with words like Air Craft Carrier, Prime Time Player, Ipy-Do, vrey, The Big T, and run "n" gun offense. Their brain is overpowered by the Round Ball Fever and all their victim can tell you is what the score and who one the last game. The 64 game NCAA tournament has arrived. Food, Rest, or Contact with the outside world doesn't exist any more. All that is important is how your favorite team is doing who in the hell is Manassas State. The T.V. never is turn off, the user is numb to reality and its problems. All they ever want is another shot, steal, or block.

The March Madness starts to take it toll on its subject as bags form under the eyes, throats become raw, and life forces become harder to see. Then when all hope is lost on this poor soul who has ignored friends, good eating habits, and sleep; it's suddenly over. The last game has been played in April and its victim has been released from its basketball intoxication to resume his or her normal lives again. Yet the disease hasn't been vanquished it will be back another March to prey on more weak souls and the cry of "Who Won" will be heard once again.

If you want to help out a basketball buddy of yours, be aware of the early warning signs: 1) Does your have to call your friend/spouse name more than 5 times to get his/her attention? 2) Do talks end up on the basketball topic? 3) Has your friend become jumpy lately? 4) Can your friend name all the teams in the top twenty? 5) Have you ever found a remote control in his pocket? 6) Does slain dunk the goldfish and yell "That's Two" (A dead give-away!) 7) Does he become lost in shopping malls with TV. centers? If you answer yes to three or more to these questions then your friend has the fever. The best you can do is be understanding, cover them up at night, and hope that your T.V. warranty does run out mid-way the tournament.

Computers Shut Down!

Student Records Lost In Freak Accident

BY CHAD ADAMS
MANAGING EDITOR

In a freak accident which occurred over Easter break, approximately 50% of the records in the registrar's office were lost.

"The computers just shut down. We were updating the system and then we had a power surge of some sort. We tried to call up the A's and nothing," said Herb Allbright, director of the registrar's office.

According to Allbright the loss of student records is a catastrophe of "major proportions."

On Friday, March 24th the record keeping system was being converted over to a quicker and more efficient system. The power surge hit just after the program had been activated and the records through "M" were erased before Sandy Belk, an office worker, noticed the program was "out of whack."

"I hit the escape key and it stopped. I had been watching the screen and noticed that the delete command had been activated by the surge, before I could do anything the records were gone. We were lucky we didn't lose anything else," said Belk.

Concern culminated in light of upcoming graduation. Some administrators felt that graduation might be jeopardized by the accident.

"We have graduation coming up in a little over a month and absolutely no record for students whose last names begin with A through M," said Allbright.

The only other records that exist with student grades and transcripts are on paper. The workers in the registrar's office will spend the next few weeks typing and restoring handwritten student records.

Students are asked to be patient and not to worry about their records.

"We realize that the potential for a major panic exists, but we are trying to rectify the problem," said Allbright.

Assistant to the Registrar, Hal Junkiper stated, "There is no need to worry; if worse comes to worse we'll simply postpone graduation for a few days until the records are there again. We don't want to miss anyone."

Student reaction to the incident was swift. Michael Felwright, a sophomore majoring in Economics, felt the registrar's office should have not tried to update their system saying "the entire incident reeked of irresponsibility."

Seniors were even more concerned. John "Howie" Harbush, a senior political science major, stated, "I can't believe after four years of hard work work that my graduation could be postponed by a simple 'power surge'. If I could have used that excuse for my last homework I might have graduated magna cum laude."

Only a small minority of students have heard of the accident and the administration is

UNCW Streaker Might Be Linked To Staff

BY CELESTE BULLEY
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

It seems UNCW has its own piece of 60's memorabilia in an unidentified male who upholds the tradition of "streaking."

A female Hall '85 student first reported the streaker to campus police Thursday, March 23, after she saw him running out of the Social and Behavioral Science Building, past Cameron and into the woods near the Hall 85 parking lot.

"As I was coming out the door after my 6:30 p.m. class, I saw a man walking from S&B...I thought he was wearing a beige sweat suit at first," said Sue Prize. "I couldn't believe he was naked!"

Prize said when he saw her he started running. "I was so shocked, later I thought maybe someone had stolen his clothes. But I decided to report it to the police anyway."

When reported to campus security, they reached the same verdict, that it was probably the victim of a fraternity prank. "Usually serious streakers pick well-populated places in daylight hours," said Barney Loafer, campus security officer. "They mean to attract as much attention as possible."

"I was so shocked, later I thought maybe someone had stolen his clothes"

This decision was later retracted, when the streaker made a surprise appearance Thursday, March 25 at 4:07 p.m., running from Friday Hall to Morton Hall.

"He just disappeared!" said James Thurber, sophomore. "I was walking into the building at the same time he was running in. I looked for him when I got in, but he had sort of evaporated."

Loafer commented, "This leads us to believe that the streaker might have a connection to the staff, since he disappears upon entering a building."

"The faculty offices are near the entrance; maybe he hides in a friend's office and redresses," Loafer said.

Campus police are starting the search for any evidence which would lead to his capture. He urges students to be on the lookout for the streaker, and to call security officers.

One thing, however, complicates the search: the streaker wears a child's Ronald Regan Halloween mask.

Excavation Reveals Shocking New Discovery

FROM STAFF REPORTS

Near this area in the construction of the new cafeteria were found the bones which have lead to the calling in of archaeologists. (Photo by M. Ed)

An extraordinary discovery was made Thursday March 23 at the construction site for the new cafeteria. While excavating a trench for the plumbing system, several large bones were discovered.

Nobel prize winning archaeologist Norman Wise was flown in from Princeton University. "The bones are at least eleven million years old," Wise stated. "Further carbon testing will be needed in order to obtain a more accurate age."

Wise's examination seems to have convinced campus officials that it's not a hoax, and construction of the new cafeteria is being halted. "Until further excavation is complete, the cafeteria can wait," said UNCW's Dean of Special Affairs W.T. Carpel. "Studies of this site are of a higher priority."

The seven-man archeology team flown into Wilmington to study the bones were ecstatic over the find. "We are eager to find out if there are other artifacts on this campus and we are trying to develop a hypothesis to explain the presence of the bones in this area of the country," commented S. O. Skinner, Berkeley's geographical specialist.

Terrence Boney, a member of Archeology team, said "This find could invalidate numerous theories about the presence of prehistoric reptilia in this area of North America."

"According to modern theory, this area of the country would've been under at least fifty feet of water at that period of time," said Boney.

"If there are any other bones found, the cafeteria may be relocated altogether," said Carpel. "It's hard to believe that with all the growth in this area something hasn't been found before."

"It seems strange that something so ancient could have such an impact on this campus and its development."

"Reverence For Life" Celebrated

KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

In celebration of Albert Schweitzer's "Reverence for Life," UNCW played host to a Nobel Prize winner, a renowned opera singer, and a world authority in psychosomatic medicine. While doing so, UNCW received presidential recognition.

The Albert Schweitzer International Prizes are held every four years on the campus of UNCW, to honor individuals worldwide who reflect Schweitzer's philosophy of "reverence for Life."

The prizes are awarded to individuals who follow this philosophy by contributing in the three areas in which Schweitzer excelled: medicine, music, and the humanities.

The prize ceremony, which was originated by UNCW Philosophy and Religion Professor Dr. Gerald Shinn, is sponsored by the North Carolina Educational, Historical, and Scientific Foundation, Inc.. This year the prize recipients were Dr. George Hitchings, medicine; Dr. Boris Luban-Plozza, humanities; and Beverly Sills, music.

The three honored guests were awarded $5,000 and a bronze medal on the evening of March 22, in Kenan Auditorium.

The evening began with music by the UNCW Brass Ensemble, an audio-visual about the life and contributions of Schweitzer, and a welcome by UNCW's chancellor, William H. Wagoner.

Wagoner welcomed those present on behalf of the university and expressed his admiration of the man for whom the prizes are named, hoping they will assist in keeping his name alive.

"Dr. Schweitzer's humility, love, and belief in the sanctity of life is the very essence of what I think this university stands for. (Schweitzer) exemplified all that is in us at the university, with utmost humility. I wish for the next four years, you will take with you the great principles of Dr. Albert Schweitzer, in remembrance of him and all that he stood for," said Wagoner.

Wagoner's speech was followed by a performance by the UNCW Gospel Choir and introductions of the director of the Schweitzer Prizes, Delores Kirk, and the Master of Ceremonies Hugh Morton Sr., distinguished North Carolinian.

Morton introduced Dr. Paul Talalay, who presented the medal to Dr. George Hitchings.

"The choice of George Hitchings to receive this award would have pleased the saintly Albert Schweitzer. Both men dedicated their lives to the relief of suffering and helping the less fortunate," said Talalay.

SGA Elections Post Highest Turnout In School's History

BY CHAD ADAMS
MANAGING EDITOR

The Student Government Association's spring elections were held on Monday, March 20th and appear to be one of the most successful elections in the school's history.

"From what I've seen, as far as voting, there was a greater turnout this year than last," said Tasha Boone, SGA's Election Board Chairman.

Students were able to vote not only at the Union, which has traditionally been the only voting booth, but at Bell Hall as well. This added polling location plus the student interest at the outdoor debate seemed to be the strongest reasons for the increase in student votes.

Present Student Body President Karla Alston stated that this election had the "highest voter turnout ever. We had 12% of the students actually vote whereas we usually have about 8-9%."

Alston also believed this election to have had "the best run campaigns" in recent history.

Student Body President Elect Jim Humphries felt that the elections "sparked an interest in Student Government" and was optimistic that the trend would continue in the coming year.

Despite the apparent success of the election, several students still felt that 12% left something to be desired.

"I wish more students would respond and vote," said Vice President elect Kenneth Lemon.

While expressing this concern, Lemon still felt that the election was "well run" and that "everyone involved stayed within ethical bounds" to bring about a good election.

There was some concern of possible "block voting" in the newly elected senate due to the fact that nine of the thirty two senate seats in the SGA were won by members of the Chi Phi fraternity, yet no formal complaints were lodged to protest the election.

According to records this is the largest number of seats ever to be held by members of one registered organization.

Delta Tau Delta had held eight seats in the senate under Lee King's 1987-88 administration.

Inauguration Ceremonies for the newly elected members of the SGA will be held in the Hawk's Nest at 6:00 p.m. and is students are encouraged to attend.

BSAC & Bryan Meet, Discuss Demands

BY BRUCE FOLEY
STAFF WRITER

Protesting the decision to cancel a tentative rap concert scheduled for April 8, concerned individuals rallied together to form the Black Student Action Committee (BSAC). Amos Quick, president of the NAACP and founder of the BSAC accused UNCW's administration of disrupting the peace and overall growth of black students.

Meeting with local media and administrative officials on March 22, the BSAC expressed grievances regarding the handling of the concert event. Complaints ranged from lack of student involvement on the part of Vice Chancellor Bryan's cancellation, to allegations of unsubstantiated violence at previous dances played by the scheduled rap bands.

"The decision made in regard to the rap concert cancellation was not solely based on Joe Johnson's report. It was based on concerns involving the security rider and consultation with Paul Englin," contended Bryan.

Paul Englin, Assistant to the Chancellor for Legal Affairs, expressed a concern involving the security rider requiring the use of metal detectors.

"If you agree to increase the security of the event, you imply a prior understanding that there is a risk of danger. It would expose the university to a risk of liability," said Englin.

After both sides presented their assessments of the concert cancellation, the BSAC presented a list of concerns which they believed to be imperative for the advancement of the black student community.

"We are tired of the constant harassment towards us, by the very body that is supposed to be protecting us, the campus police. We are tired of being treated as if our culture is not important," stated Quick.

The concerns focused on various aspects of the university security office, specifically leadership, policies, and the overall role played by campus police.

"We've been having problems with the campus security for some time and the general attitude they portray towards black students," said Kenneth Lemon, member of the BSAC.

Anger from the alleged incidents of harassment by the campus police, including unnecessary ID checks of black students, and unexpected early closings of black dances in the Union has prompted the committee to request a review of the campus security office.

Other issues brought to light were excessive security measures at dances and increased funding for structured social activities. The BSAC gave the administration until March 27 to respond to their concerns.

Monday morning, Vice Chancellor Bryan met with a staff of various department members to discuss possible solutions for the issues raised by the BSAC. "It was an atmosphere of concern. We realized there was a problem and we wanted to resolve it fairly," said Jackie Skinner, Assistant Dean of Students.

"The Chancellor said he wanted our help to find out where the students are coming from and how we should respond to this," said Pat Leonard, Dean of Students.

"They have some criticisms toward the campus police department, whether they're real or not real, they are the feelings expressed by the black students and they are true feelings," said Leonard.

Volunteer Service Offers Cultural Opportunities

(Submitted Release)- A growing number of young Americans are combining travel and volunteer service through journeys of international good will -- restoring a 10th century watermill in France, working at a children's crisis center in Ireland, harvesting crops in Czechoslovakia or excavating a Roman city in Spain, according to the Council on International Educational Exchange (CIEE), which sponsors its International Workcamps program in 14 countries in Europe and North America.

"Volunteer workcamps have been popular in Europe since the 1920's, but it's a relatively unknown concept for Americans that's growing rapidly," says CIEE program coordinator Rick LaVer, who saw enrollment rise more than 30 percent last year.

One reason for the increased popularity of workcamps is a greater interest by Americans to meet people from other cultures, along with a growing emphasis in the U. S. on participation in voluntary service. In a typical workcamp setting, 15-20 volunteers from all over the world live in communal fashion, working long hours and then relaxing and sightseeing together.

"The work provides a loose structure and a continuity which hold people to a place and to one another long enough for bonds to form," says Don Hudson, who spent two weeks in France last summer excavating a chateau. "You spend enough time with people to see through the differences to underlying similarities and through the similarities to underlying differences."

18-year-old Erica Goldberger, who worked on a forest reclamation project in West Germany, was the only American among volunteers from Holland, West Germany, Algeria, Spain and France. "I learned so much," says Erica. "I feel much more responsible, independent and self-confident. I learned about life in many different cultures and made friends from all over the world."

International workcamps take place in the summer and are arranged by CIEE in cooperation with organizations in Canada, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Turkey and the U.S. Workcamps range in length from two to four weeks.

Projects are located in small villages, cities, national parks and forests, archaeological digs, historic monuments and castles. Activities include construction and renovation, forestry and nature conservation and work with children and the elderly. Minimum age for volunteers is 18, with a limited opportunity for 16-year-olds. Most participants are 20 to 35-year-olds.

Volunteers, who are responsible for transportation costs to the workcamp and a $100 program fee, are provided with free room and board.

Additional information and applications from CIEE, Dept. 16, 205 E. 42nd St., New York, NY, 10017 Application deadline is May 1, 1989.

Show Your Care About the Protection of Your Water Resource

(Press Release) There will be a public hearing on the protection of outstanding resource waters on March 30, 1989 - 10 a.m. and March 31, 1989 - 9 a.m. Blockade Runner, Wrightsville Beach.

What is the hearing about? The Coastal Resources Commission is holding a public hearing on proposed regulations to protect Outstanding Resource Waters (ORW). These are our most valuable, productive, pristine coastal waters. The regulations will establish the size of the Area of Environmental Concern (AEC) and how the design requirements for the AEC will be set. The Division of Coastal Management would review proposed development projects in the AEC to verify compliance with the design rules.

Will these regulations allow development in the AEC? Yes. Long term economic growth will benefit from protecting our most valuable estuarine resources. The red tide demonstrated that water quality problems, whether natural or man-made, are devastating to the entire coastal economy. Water pollution and the other adverse impacts of inadequately controlled growth are the greatest threats to long term economic health. In adopting the existing stormwater regulations the EMC recognized that additional protection was needed for our most sensitive coastal resources. Governor Martin's Coastal Initiative also recognizes the economic benefits of protection of ORW waters.

What is being proposed? The AEC has proposed four alternatives for public comment. The Commission may adopt one of the four or a combination of them. The alternatives are:

- (A) Existing 75 foot AEC - CAMA permit not issued unless the Division of Environmental Management approves application.
- (B) 575 AEC or alternative set case-by-case - Limit of 25% built upon.

(C) 575 AEC or alternative set case-by-case - No CAMA permit if less than 25% built upon; if greater than 25% built upon, CAMA permit not issued unless DEM approves.

(D) At least 75 foot AEC set case-by-case by CRC - Design requirement developed case-by-case for each ORW in conjunction with Environmental Management Commission (EMC).

Which alternatives should the CRC adopt? The Coastal Federation recommends that the CRC adopt a modified version of Alternative (B). The AEC should be 575 feet or an alternative distance set case-by-case with the concurrence of the EMC.

The design criteria should be density limits and setbacks established by the EMC on a case-by-case basis for each ORW since its staff has more technical expertise in protecting water quality. Engineered stormwater devices should not be used to allow high density development since engineered systems are very unreliable.

A CAMA permit should be required for all projects to give the public the opportunity to review a project to verify that it properly complies with the built upon criteria.

Who determines which waters are ORW? The Environmental Management Commission will determine which waters are ORW in further public hearings later this spring.

Which hearing should I attend? The CRC will begin discussing the proposed regulations on Thursday afternoon, March 30. Attend the hearing Thursday morning if you can't attend both hearings.

Contact the North Carolina Coastal Federation at 919-393-8185 for more information. Written statements can be submitted to DCM, P.O. Box 27687, Raleigh, NC 27611-7687 prior to March 30.

Distinguished Speaker Series Hosts Campbell

WILMINGTON -- The Graduate School of The University of North Carolina at Wilmington is initiating its distinguished speaker series with a program that will feature the topic "Sea Island History, Culture and Environment: The African-American Experience" at 7 p.m., Thursday, April 6, at Bryan Auditorium in Morton Hall.

The program is free, and the public is invited to attend. The series is designed to bring outstanding speakers to the campus to talk about topics of interest across disciplinary lines.

Presenting this lecture will be Emory Shaw Campbell, executive director of Penn Community Services, Inc., St. Helena Island, near Beaufort, S.C. A major function of the Penn Community Services is the Penn Center, operational for more than 127 years as an educational resource center whose mission is to keep alive the rich historical heritage of the sea islands and to act as a catalyst for programs for self-sufficiency for Sea Islanders.

A key element of the Penn Center is the 50-acre Penn School Historic District, which includes a museum exhibiting Sea Island life and which assists scholars in researching African-American life and history. The Penn School was established in 1862 when abolitionists arrived on St. Helena Island to educate newly freed plantation slaves. Sent by the Philadelphia Quakers as members of the Port Royal Relief Committee -- to encourage self-sufficiency among the former slaves -- two Pennsylvania women, Laura Towne and Ellen Murray, founded Penn School on the Oaks Plantation of St. Helena Island. This was the most successful and only lasting element of the Port Royal Experiment.

The School continued until its last graduation in 1953 when the county public school system extended to include St. Helena students. However, the impact of the Penn Center remains strong in the community and today serves as a conference center with strong emphasis on bi-racial activities.

The United States Peace Corps has worked with the Penn Center in training volunteers preparing for service in Africa and Central America. Martin Luther King came to St. Helena, conducting bi-racial meetings and enjoying the simplicity and quiet of Penn's campus with its stately live oaks and historical buildings.

Campbell will discuss his work at the Penn Center in the lecture that UNCW Graduate Dean Eric Bolen says will be an "eloquent discussion of cultural resources associated with the South Carolina Sea Islands." In addition to the public lecture, Campbell will spend time on campus during the day, interacting with students and faculty.

Campbell, who earned a bachelor of science degree in biology from Savannah State College, and a master of science degree in Environmental Health Engineering from Tufts University, Medford, MA, is a member of the Hilton Head NAACP Board of Directors and a former president of the Hilton Head NAACP. He was also a founding member of the Beaufort County (S.C.) Big Brother/Big Sister program.

He was born on Hilton Head Island in 1941.

Break from the Culture Barrier in Costa Rica

BY PATRICE BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

UNCW has signed a pact with Universidad Nacional in Costa Rica, (UNA), for an exchange program.

According to Dr. Charles Fugler, Professor of Biological Sciences at UNCW, this program is the first of its kind, and will teach UNCW students a lesson in humanity.

Fugler and Carlos Araya Poncho, Chancellor at UNA, were representatives from their universities for the signing of this agreement in Costa Rica on December 19, 1988.

The agreement calls for UNA to assist UNCW in conducting two summer school sessions at UNA for a select group of UNCW students.

In return, UNCW will admit a qualified UNA graduate student to pursue a master's degree.

Dr. James Sabella, chairman of the sociology and anthropology department at UNCW, and Dr. Lleana Clavijo, assistant professor of biological science at UNCW, will conduct classes in Costa Rica at UNA this summer.

Fugler believes that UNCW students don't come in contact with a great diversity of world cultures, and said "a university isn't complete without a cross-section of all languages, cultures, and ethnic groups. The mere presence of international [culture] benefits students, to come in contact, see, and learn from it."

The selection of the students is by application, and several meetings and orientations will be held on customs and codes of behavior in Costa Rica.

Fugler said the students will come back with different attitudes, having learned something and to have "broken out of the provincialism that surrounds them and limits their viewpoints. Language and culture is a barrier that can be overcome."

Jose Escorriola, a graduate student from UNA, is currently enrolled in the graduate program at UNCW studying Marine Biology.

Escorriola said that studying at UNCW is an "outstanding, incredible experience, to work with these people." When he finishes his studies, he plans to return to Costa Rica and pursue a fisheries-related job.

Fugler hopes that the program will expand in the future to include other Latin American and non-Western institutions.

"Humanity is the underlying factor," he said "and is, in itself, an educational experience."

For more information on this program, contact Sabella at 395-3420, or Fugler at 395-3482.

NCSU Greek Leadership Workshop Offered

(NCSU News Release)- Students, faculty, staff and alumni from universities in North and South Carolina and Virginia are invited to attend a one-day workshop at North Carolina State University focusing on fraternity and sorority life.

The workshop, the 10th annual NCSU Greek Leadership Workshop, will be held Saturday, April 2, at McKimmon Center. It is sponsored by the NCSU Department of Student Development.

Will Keim, campus minister at Oregon State University will be the featured speaker. His address, "Demythologizing the Animal House," will focus on character and leadership development, community service and other worthwhile elements of fraternity and sorority living.

Among the other speakers will be David L. Westol, the executive director of Theta Chi fraternity, who will present "Hazing on Trial," a dramatization of the aftermath of a hazing incident. Gary H. Bonas Jr., assistant director of student activities at Villanova University, will discuss fraternity and sorority marketing strategies.

Jan Rogers, NCSU coordinator for women student concerns, will present two programs, one on images of women in campus media and events and the other on date rape. Dr. Edward M. King, director of residential life and the student judicial system at Bradley University, will speak on "Values and Ritual in Greek Life."

The $10 registration fee, which includes a buffet luncheon, is due March 27. For further information, call Drew Smith at (919) 757-2441.

Business Week '89 Enlightening

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

UNCW's Cameron School of Business had another successful Business Week earlier this March. This Seventh Annual Business Week was designed to bridge the gap between academic theory and the real world of business.

"This year's Business Week will be hard to beat next year," said Dr. Les Sherman, Chairman of Business Week.

Business Week activities started off with the Ninth Annual Commerce Cup Challenge. The Commerce Cup Challenge allowed students to demonstrate their academic skills in a competitive but relaxed atmosphere.

Joanna Manning, a junior Marketing major, said "watching the Commerce Cup Challenge made me realize how much I had learned about the business world."

Representatives from local and national businesses, industries, and corporations were invited to discuss subjects pertaining to their field, providing students with knowledge of the real world, knowledge not found in textbooks.

"This year's Business Week will be hard to beat next year..."

The high point of Business Week '89 was the keynote speaker, William J. Warwick, President of AT&T Microelectronics of New Jersey. "Working for a Fortune 500 Company" was the topic of Warwick's keynote address.

Judy Moore, senior Finance major, said "I gained beneficial information about how to function in a large corporation and how to progress with a Fortune 500 company. Also by attending Career Day, I got to talk with representatives of companies on a casual basis to learn more about their companies."

"Business Week as a whole, gave me an opportunity to increase my interest about a particular company and perhaps to make an impression on them as well," says Moore.

This year was the highest attendance rate for Business Week. "We accomplished all of our goals and the students were able to get a lot out of this years successful Business Week. Let's hope next year's is even better," says Dr. Sherman.

Norman Kaylor, Dean of the Cameron School of Business Administration, right, awards winning team members in the Commerce Cup Challenge. The challenge, a college-bowl type competition, quizzed participants with business-related questions. The event was held during Business Week '89. This year's winning team was sponsored by the UNCW Chapter of the National Association of Accountants (NAA). Team members were (from left to right), Paula Braddock, Carlton Boney, and Cathy Stoltz.

Spring Week '89 End of Year Bash Coming in April

As the year draws to a close, the Association for Campus Entertainment is preparing for its annual end-of-the-year blast. ACE will be presenting Spring Week - an entire week of events from April 3rd to April 7th. We would like to encourage every individual who is part of the UNCW community to come out and participate.

The schedule of events include:

- Monday April 3 - The Dating Game

This is just like the one you used to watch on TV!

Winning couples will be awarded dinners and other various prizes. The Dating Game will be held in the University Union Living Room at 7:00 pm.

- Tuesday April 4 - Free Video Photobooths!

This will be all day in the University Union. Bring your friends and get buttons made of you doing interesting things. All buttons come with the saying of your choice.

Shakespeare in the Courtyard

Watch your fellow theatre students stage a collage of scenes from some of the immortal bard's greatest plays. Stop in from 12:30 pm to 2:00 pm in the University Union Courtyard. Of course, it's free!

- Wednesday April 5 - The reggae band Harari

This fantastic group has opened for such bands as the Yellow Man and Bob Marley's former group, the Wailers. Harari will play in the University Union room 100 from 7:00 - 11:00 pm.

- Thursday April 6 - The Rocky Horror Picture Show

Back by popular demand. Come out and do the time warp again! The film will be shown at 10 pm and midnight in University Union room 100. Admission will be $1.00 with a costume and $2.00 without a costume. The infamous Rocky Horror Party Paks will be provided. No water, alcoholic beverages, bottles, cans, or plastic containers will be permitted at the movie.

- Friday April 7 - Free Tie-Dye

Available during the day on the University Union Lawn

Step-N-2

This new, young group will be presenting its Album Release party here at UNCW. Come out and hear some great and original tunes by an up and coming new band. Tapes, CD's, records and posters will be given away. Free admission. The show will start at 10 p.m. in room 100 of the Union.

Spring Week is a time when all students can loosen up and have a great time here at UNCW. Wonderful so make plans now to participate in all the events.

becoming ever more concerned of the rumors that might start.

Vice-chancellor Bryan Williams stated, "We had no way of discerning what would happen. It is, however, important to realize that it did and there is little if anything that we can do now except wait and see. The concern is shared by all and the entire ordeal will be investigated in detail shortly."

As of Wednesday night the registrar's office had restored the records and transcripts of students with names, ending in A through Anderson.

Students are asked not to inquire as to the status of their records because of the amount of work left to do. Notices will be posted everyday at noon outside of the Union on the announcement board.

AAUW Booksale To Be Held April 1st.

(Press Release) Great books and bargain prices are the winning combination on April 1st as the Wilmington Branch of the American Association of University Women holds its annual used book sale. Thousands of volumes will be available for $.25 and up at the Center Court of Independence Mall during Mall hours from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m.

Selections vary from first editions of classic literature to travelogues to textbooks, to juvenile literature to romance novels to spy thrillers. There is indeed something for every reader's taste.

AAUW holds this annual event to raise funds for local and national scholarships. Nationally, the organization gives more than $1 million each year to women who are pursuing advanced and professional degrees and to fund community projects. The local branch is working toward an endowed scholarship at UNCW-Wilmington.

The Wilmington Branch of AAUW was organized May 12, 1954.

Objectivity is the Key to BSAC Issue

What happened here at UNCW with the cancellation of a concert is in no way unusual, even for this school. Even the feelings of outrage and injustice both black and white, student and administrator have felt because of this issue are not unique.

What is sadly singular is, however, the lack of objectivity exhibited by those who feel themselves adult enough to make demands.

We have heard on TV and in the area papers --and in at least this issue of the Seahawk-- what the complaints are of the BSAC (Black Student Action Committee). But no one has listened to the administration without a predisposed accusatory ear.

Part of one's responsibility as a rational party in the pursuit of rectification of injustices is listening. It is difficult to make decisions satisfactory to all when one side demands and one side listens. There is great power in having the confidence in your cause and the self control to question, not demand.

What the students feel to be an issue is their reality, just as what the administration feels to be the truth is a reality. Who's to say who owns the more genuine conviction.

But what can be said, and what needs some attention is what actual truths formed the base for that student group's perceptions.

It is a reality that none of the Wilmington media knew enough at the onset to ask poignant questions of Vice Chancellor Bryan. Few people had actually seen the security rider and acknowledged its severity, and that is an issue that no one seems willing to address.

The bottom line is this, the cancellation of the concert was due to a problem with money and liability. The issue of campus security is not related to or part of the concert issue.

Maybe that is where the BSAC's cause lost its appeal for many students; they diffused their focus and the whole issue took on the appearance of the little boy who cried wolf, with certain members of the group crying 'racism' at every turn during the past year. Maybe if BSAC was more specific in their allegations, the administration and students would have been more supportive and understanding.

If any individual or group hopes to gain wide support of their cause it would be best to impress the nonbelieving with calm, open minded well-spokenness instead of anger and an unyielding belief in their self-righteousness.

Corrections

In the Seahawk article titled 'Bryan Gives Rap the Boot' in the March 16 issue, John Freer, concert chairperson for ACE, was mistakenly identified as John Meers. In the same article, Chris Meredith should have read 'Meredith'. We apologize for any confusion or anguish this caused anyone!

Letters

To the Editor:

I am writing in reference to the campaign slogan of SGA presidential candidate, Jim Humphries, which claims that "Student Government does effect you" (The Seahawk, 16 March). With this assertion I must wholeheartedly disagree. I was in born in 1966 and reached the legal age of maturity with no contribution from the SGA whatsoever. In addition, I find it hard to believe that student government "effects" any of the students of this university. That it has in any way caused my existence, is simply not true.

To clarify, it must be said that I hold no negative attitudes toward the student government. Their actions are important, and I am certain that they "affect" all of us.

Parking Ticket Payoff Time

With Chad Adams, Managing Editor

I received a parking ticket last week along with about 400 other students. I'll be the first to pay for a ticket if I truly deserve it, but there are times that you really can't do anything about it.

Some will tell you to appeal it. My question is, do you know who serves on the parking appeals board?

Odds are you have no idea. Most of the time those who taken this route to protest their tickets receive a standard letter saying that their appeal has been denied and that they should pay their ticket as soon as possible so that they may continue their education here at UNCW.

How would you feel if you couldn't graduate because of a $5 parking ticket?

One senior at the University of Oregon was sent to jail for sending a letter filled with "profanity". He couldn't believe they charged him a whole 25¢ per half hour.

In 1987, a student at Arizona State University mailed in feces, cactus needles, paper soaked in urine, and rodent ears instead of paying a $25 parking fine.

At any rate, I was delivering a message to a friend in the campus apartments, it was raining and the message was very important (yes I tried to get her on the phone; it was busy).

When I pulled in to the parking spaces between Galloway and Belk I found that the fifteen minute space was filled with a campus truck. I didn't have time to debate whether or not this message was worth getting a ticket over as I was only going to be there for about two minutes.

I ran to her apartment gave her the message and arrived back at the car in time to see the tail lights of the little three wheeled ticket terror leaving the scene under the yellow haze of the lights. Scenes from "The Terminator" ran through my mind as I glanced down at the window and saw the standard yellow (how fitting a color for a parking officer to issue) ticket on the windshield.

At first I kind of laughed, heck it wasn't my car and I could probably have gotten away with not paying it, but I have more respect for my friends than that. I waited for about a week for the frustration and powerlessness to end and went to pay for the ticket.

I had been trying to find a way to get rid of some of my savings anyway so I took my Budweiser bank up to the cashier's office and counted out five hundred pennies.

If you've had a ticket in recent months that you really don't feel that you deserve, I'm not talking about flagrant violations, I mean the kind that in your heart you know you don't deserve, pay them off in loose change (preferably pennies). Pennies are U.S. currency and they're fun to deposit and keep track of. It beats being arrested and besides it gives you something to do other than get ticked off.

Take a Moment and Think

Once more Spring Break has provided for me the glorious experience of sailing in the Bahamas. And once more I have found myself regaining an awareness of a significant quality of life that I tend to lose in the normal routine of my daily life, a quality, when claimed, can enhance all of our days.

On board the Shark IX with sixteen student friends, life has a kind of openness and simplicity. A lot of obligations are left behind. A lot of concerns about the future are put on the shelf for this week. In addition, the design of the week is to increase our awareness of ourselves, our relationships to our beautiful blue-green environment, and our relationships with each other. All this comes together in such a way that we find ourselves "living in the moment."

"Living in the moment" is a beautiful quality of life that allows us to find greater feeling and meaning in any given present moment. Living those days aboard that sailboat remind me, once again, how much we contaminate the potential for living fully in the present by all the worries and anxieties that are related to our personal past and our personal futures. Most of us have had experiences that leave us feeling emotionally inadequate or guilty, even unsure about our strength or value. Most of us face very real concerns about a future that is filled with economic insecurities, possible nuclear holocaust and all kinds of concerns about the possibility of building a successful marriage. These are real. If there is ever any motivation needed to find ways to deal with these concerns, it comes to me when I am reminded of how joyful and enriching it is to live "in the present moment."

When my mind is not cluttered with past or future, the present opens up in breadth and depth like the sunrise opens the world before me as it climbs across the far horizon and the ocean depths unfold. This occurs as we sail from blue-green shallows into ocean deep blue.

It means we can see more of what's happening before our very eyes and hear with greater depth. It means that we feel less fear and are more able simply to be ourselves. It means really being able to be with someone and not be preoccupied. It's the freedom to lie in the water and watch the same fish through their brightly colored coral for five minutes and not feel like you have to go anywhere. It is being able to sit with someone for whom you care, say nothing and feel as though this is the most precious moment of life. To live in the moment is the only hedge I know against the rapid passage of time, for moments fully experienced fell like hours and the day lived in the present feels twice as long as my normal hectic day.

None of us ever expect to live our lives always "in the present moment," but we can enrich ourselves by seeking to increase such experiences in our lives. We can work harder in managing the elements of our past and future that contaminate the present once we discover how long and significant a present moment can be. We will be motivated to let it happen more and more in our lives.

Most of us are always on the move, always busy with list of things to be done that never ends. Stop, be aware of this moment; savor your own uniqueness, savor the person you are with, savor the sounds and sights that surround you. You will be the richer for it. There is simply no greater blessing than to live fully in each moment, in each day of our lives.

The Other Side

By Rick Cairns

Horrorscopes for Real People

If you were born on this date (April 1): The moon is currently in Uranus. You are wishy-washy and extremely unattractive. There's good chance that your parents are your brother and sister. You usually stand out in a crowd because your body odor and looks nauseate the masses. Your favorite color is beige, your lucky number is 973, and your favorite food is pop tarts.

Any friends that you have are only using you, and really despise you. They are planning to kill you. Your lucky flower is ragweed and lucky animal is weasel. You should move to another town immediately or you will soon be pushing up petunias. Have a nice day. Happy Birthday loser.

Aries (March 21 to April 19): This is a bad day to leave the house, but a good day to sort your socks in order of thickness. A good day to really take a look at yourself, and once and for all decide if it is worth going on. A great day to eat vegetables with the letter "C" in them.

Taurus (April 20 to May 20): Your increasing unpopularity has to do with your snake-like personality. You should begin looking looking behind you wherever you go. Death is in the air. Life gradually seems more and more fruitless. A good day to read The Satanic Verses. Your left nostril will be filled with mucus all day--Blow it!

Gemini (May 21 to June 20): A poor day to spend money or eat hamburger. A friend will introduce you to a member of the opposite sex who will make your life a living hell. A good day to scrape all of the gross stuff from between your toes. Avoid Libras with one eyebrow. A good day to eat fruit with the letter "Q" in it.

Cancer (June 21 to July 22): A bad day to get out of bed. The best thing that can possibly happen to your life is a bullet in the brain. Most probably, a malignant tumor is festering in your pancreas. A good day to review your life insurance. A good day to eat fiber. This is the first day of the rest of your putrid life.

Leo (July 23 to August 22): You may be romantically drawn to a Bull Terrier today. Go for it! A good day to shave your butt and sit in a bowl of gin. The person that means more to you than anyone else is a buthole. A great day to eat flesh with the letter "C" in it.

Virgo (August 23 to September 22): You will feel an urge to wear leather panties and beg to be whipped. A good day to ask for a bank loan. You will hear from a loved one who died years ago. Don't go to your mailbox today. An excellent day to eat a Butterfinger.

Libra (September 23 to October 22): You will feel this sharp pain in your intestines today; it will force you to double over. You won't receive any visitors or cards. You will never be able to pay the hospital bill. A good day to eat raw liver. Your mother hates you.

Scorpio (October 23 to November 21): If you are romantically involved--break it off immediately. You are most likely a gross, impolite pig who picks his/her nose with authority. You will puke out of your nostrils before the day is out. A good day to eat a grape tollipop.

Sagittarius (November 22 to December 21): Your mother will continue to dress you funny. A large painful boil is festering on your back. A good day to rip off a convenient store. You are most likely a homosexual. A good day to eat boiled worms.

Capricorn (Dec. 22 to January 19): Your loyalty will be your downfall; not to mention your large protruding buttocks. A good day to really piss off someone of the opposite sex. You are beginning to go bald. Don't have sex today or you will be sorry. A good day to eat rancid toast. Life is much worse than you think.

Aquarius (January 20 to February 18): A good day to get wild. Your boss is planning to give you the ax--so you may as well quit your job. An invitation to a really nerdy get-together will arrive in the mail--you will be thrilled. A good day to wear Betty Davis stilettos and prance around the house naked (especially if you're male).

Pisces (February 19 to March 20): Your academic life has reached its peak. You will flounder around in mediocrity for the rest of your life, and not even know it. A good day to shave your head and sell flowers at the airport. That nasty thing that you did in the seventh grade will finally catch up to you. A good day to pull all of your teeth out and eat strained prunes.

El Salvador Experiences War Against University

(CPS) -- Shortly after midnight on January 13th, I was awakened in my room in San Salvador by a powerful explosion that set the bed shaking. It was the destruction of the home of Catalina Machuca de Merino, a dean at the University of El Salvador (UES), by a bomb set by the death squad ARDE. Her sleeping children were buried in glass and debris, but no one was killed.

The next morning, university authorities held a press conference in a campus auditorium to denounce attack and a campaign waged against them by the government and armed forces. But UES's rector's description of the bombing was drowned out as military helicopters buzzed the auditorium six times.

Nine years of civil war have hit hard at the University of El Salvador.

The nation's lone public institution of higher learning, UES is the only campus open to students from poor families. Eighty percent of UES's 35,000 students come from lower-income homes, many of them working for the minimum wage of $3 a day before starting four hours of classes each evening.

The university also has long been a center of criticism of the small clique of families that has ruled El Salvador for more than a hundred years. So, as El Salvador's political situation has deteriorated into civil war, it's also hated student, faculty member, administrator and UES workers' descent from the war and continuing violations of human rights.

There's been a high cost in repression.

Especially as the civil war intensified and the FMLN guerrillas, who pledge to redistribute wealth in the nation, proved powerful foes, frustrated army commanders came to vent their anger on the university community. They call it a "sanctuary for subversion."

During the time I spent at UES, the campus was heavily militarized.

Soldiers guarded each entrance, and searched students for weapons and subversive literature. They maintained a cordon around the periphery of the campus to "protect" it.

At midnight on December 23, about 30 will-armed men, some in uniform, cut the fence surrounding the university, killed a night watchman and blew up the Biology building.

Shock waves from the blast could be felt all over the capital, and the building was gutted.

On January 10, a campus auditorium was destroyed by an explosion, the newly formed death squad ARDE, which stands for "Revolutionary Anti-communist Extermination Action," took responsibility.

On January 20th, uniformed soldiers arrested Victor Manuel Sanchez, a clerk in the Economics department, on his way to campus. He was taken to the Infantry Brigade garrison, beaten and detained for several days. In the meantime, other soldiers ransacked his house, told his 2- and 4-year-old daughters their father was a subversive, and said they never see him again.

And on February 2 Economics student Mario Flores Cuba was taken from his San Salvador home by uniformed soldiers of the National Guard. His bullet-riddled body, showing signs of torture, turned up the next day in Sonsoate province.

When news of Cuba's death reached the campus, students hit the streets in fierce demonstrations.

Violence against UES is not new. In June, 1980, the army put down student demonstrations by invading with weapons firing. They attacked professors in their classrooms. They looted the buildings. Several students were raped.

The campus was closed, and stayed closed until 1984, when its students, teachers and staffers began trying to reconstruct it from scratch.

"When we returned to campus, we found that they had burned every book with a red cover, even the bible," remembered Roberto (a pseudonym). "We had to laugh. They stole everything, down to the window shades."

Then, in 1986, a massive earthquake rocked the university, damaging every building on campus. Students organized volunteer construction brigades, but even now UES's infrastructure is unrepaired. Today, many classes are held in temporary bungalows.

Not surprisingly, life at UES has radicalized many students.

Medical and law students, for example, have elaborate volunteer associations that have them suturing wounds and defending union members, risking their lives in ways that students in the United States would find incredible.

"Life expectancy is short for people who get involved in socially responsible professions in this country," one law student told me. "But these people are falsely accused, and they have a right to be defended."

On January 12, I attended a meeting held to organize a protest march against the continuing military presence around the campus.

"A regime in its dying agony makes use of all the forces left to it," said the vice president of the General Students Association. "The military cordon is psychological warfare against the university. It is an unacceptable interruption of our studies. It is intended to isolate the university, to prevent student mobilization."

The next day we walked out of UES's main gates four short blocks to the U.S. Embassy, a fortress within corrugated steel walls covered in spray paint from previous demonstrations. While soldiers in flak jackets watched, the students lifted their notebooks and pencils in the air, chanting "these are our weapons."

Student demonstrations nearly always focus on the US Embassy because the United states supplies 50-80 percent of the Salvadoran Government's budget, some $1.1 million a year in military and economic aid. At the students see it, the military campaign against them can go only so long as the U.S. allows it.

In talking to the students, they frequently asked about how likely it was that the new U.S. president would cut off the aid. What did I think of George Bush's Central American policy? Could he be different from Ronald Reagan? Could public opinion influence him to stop the war?

My answer invariably left them unsatisfied. "He doesn't really have a policy yet, so it's hard to tell," I'd say. "We'll have to wait and see."

Max Friedman, a Latin American Studies senior at Oberlin College, was at the University of El Salvador from January 11 through February 3, 1989.

Senior Takes Parking Citation To An Extreme

(CPS) -- Frustration about a major campus problem, parking, could land a University of Oregon senior in jail.

Angry that he got a ticket while he was in class taking a required four hour exam, student Jeffrey Sebastian sent a letter peppered with profanities to the city in protest.

"I wanted them to see here's a citizen who's pissed off," said Sebastian, who explained that he forgot to bring the eight quarters necessary for the parking meter.

"My God, they charge 25 cents a half hour," he exclaimed. "It's ridiculous."

But city judge Frank Bocci was offended, citing Sebastian for contempt of court, a crime that could carry a jail sentence.

A decision in the case is due sometime in March.

It's not the first time students have gone overboard in protesting campus parking conditions.

At Arizona State University in 1987, for instance, a frustrated student mailed feces, cactus needles, paper soaked in urine and rodent ears instead of a $25 fine for parking on campus with a mandatory parking decal.

American Express Hot For Undergrads

(CPS) -- American Express, known as a company for business executives and yuppies, unveiled a plan in mid-March to woo college undergrads.

With bait like cheap airline fares and magazine subscriptions, the huge financial services firm says it will start trying to tempt students at the 1,000 biggest campuses in the country to carry its credit card.

The move is emblematic of a larger trend, various consumer advocates say, of students being able to get credit more easily during the last three years.

And many of the consumer advocates don't think the credit card companies' new invasion of American campuses is a very good idea.

"(Students) are acquiring credit at a time when they are poorly suited to use it wisely," said Mike Heffer of Consumer Action, a San Francisco lobbying group, when told of the new American Express effort.

"Credit cards got me into financial trouble," agreed University of Houston senior Scott Fox. "I charged too much, and didn't have the money to pay for (it). I am in the process of paying them off now."

"The company that can put money into people's pockets will be the big winner."

But the student market "is the right place to be now" to sell credit, said Celine Gallo of American Express (Amex), assign undergrads probably will prove a good source of business for the company in the future.

"It's important to start early with people who will be better earners," she said nothing. Students are just starting to form brand loyalties. The credit card companies make their money by claiming three-to-seven percent of each purchase made with their cards, and by charging customers interest on the unpaid interest on their bills.

As anyone who's had a brochure slipped into bookstore purchases or seen booths set up at student unions can attest, American Express's ambitious new effort is only the most recent foray onto campuses for credit card companies, which until just a few years ago considered students as risky and probably incapable of repaying loans regularly.

For example Bank of America, which owns a big part of VISA, began aggressively marketing to students in 1986 when, B of A spokeswoman Susan Clevenger said, students "became more responsible."

Of course, there was nothing magical that happened in 1986 that suddenly changed students into more responsible credit users, observed University of Florida finance, Prof. Arnold Heggestad.

The answer to why credit card companies abruptly decided they wanted to start signing up students had more to do with demographics, there are fewer credit-worthy adults to be wooed these days, and the economy, he said.

"If the economy is strong," Heggestad noted, "it's a safe bet sellers will get jobs when they graduate."

"And to be futuristic for a moment," he added, "10 years from now the paper society, checks, will be gone. The companies that can put their plastic in people's pockets will be the big winners. The college market is more receptive to change, so they may be the best group to grow into."

"Their purpose," Consumer Action's Heffer believes, "is to create a population of adults tuned into the credit world."

Citicorp in New York, which started asking students to carry credit cards in the mid-eighties, has issued about 1.5 million VISAs to students, a company spokesman reported.

By contrast, "only" some 500,000 students carry American Express cards now. To catch up to VISA and Mastercard, "we're proposing an integrated marketing program that includes the cards, along with benefits and services tailored to the needs of students," Gallo said.

Students "accepted" by Amex get a $600 credit limit.

Some students and campus advisers, however, wonder if it's a good thing for students.

Thirty-five percent of the students who asked University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA) for extra financial aid from 1986 to 1988 said they needed to repay credit card debts, UCLA counselor John Hoyt said.

Iowa State University financial counselor Ann Swift said she's seen an increase in the number of students suffering from high credit card debts in recent years, and that some contemplate bankruptcy.

"Only 40 percent of credit card holders nationally pay their monthly bill. The other 60 percent have an average monthly balance of $1,600," said Swift.

Credit card abuse has become so common that the University of Southern Maine holds a session about students and credit cards at its freshmen orientation. Indiana University hosts budget planning workshops in its dorms. University of Texas students get a written warning about incurring credit card debts when they pick up their financial aid applications.

There are victims aplenty. University of Houston senior Richelle Williams said, "I was always in the hole. I cut the cards up, and kept paying on them to get my financial situation together."

The credit card companies, of course see their efforts differently.

"We're expanding the notion of financial instrument just like anyone."

Gallo maintained the Amex cards give students "less opportunity to overspend" because they're required to pay off their balances each month.

"I believe they are good in emergencies," Houston's Fox agreed.

Snady Lee, a junior at the University of California at Santa Barbara, applied for a card "so that I can start to build a credit rating."

Consumer Action's Heffer also thought the new credit card campaigns can help students get credit while they can.

"As soon as they graduate, it's harder to obtain a card even if the person is working," Heffer said.

Wild Man Rocks Mad Monk

ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

It was a dark, stormy night Thursday, March 23 at the Mad Monk. As people poured in, so did the rain. I was there to interview the lead singer, songwriter, and namesake of the Ben Friedman Band (formerly IBM).

Interviews always make me nervous and this twenty-minute rap session in the Monk's graffiti room was no exception. Ironically, Ben was nervous too (whether because of the show or my sharp, probing questions I don't know), so I felt better. In person this guy is gracious, warm, witty, and sensitive and I actually had fun.

We discussed a wide variety of topics (baking bread, old cars, etc.), rock-n-roll being one of the subjects covered, of course. Ben originally considered becoming a pilot like his dad, but got hooked on being a rocker instead. He says performing is like a drug. "It'll nail you just like that. You're bit."

When the band is not on the road, Ben prefers what he calls a "low key life" at home. He gets enough nightlife from his work, so when he gets home he just wants to be "normal."

After learning this in my interview, I was left completely unprepared for the show. The warm, sensitive guy I met backstage never made it on stage. He was replaced by a wild man. (Now I know why he wants to be "normal" when he goes home!)

On stage The Ben Friedman Band is versatile as well as energetic (even the road man, Harold, can and did sing). Frank Farr, the band's drummer, proved to be quite a singer when he and Friedman switched places. The lead singer was quite a drummer as well. Bassist Tom Saari (also a great PR man) and guitarist Kerry Elliot kept rockin' while pandamonium broke loose on stage.

The said pandamonium was in the form of a frightening number of people from the audience who literally overran the stage. The band didn't seem to mind as these unexpected guests danced on stage with them.

The guys put on a good show and kept the audience movin' (especially those who swamped the stage). In the future, I'd like to see more of The Ben Friedman Band and more original songs from them.

Coolman Jazz Fest Soloist

(UNCW News) Todd Coolman, one of the more in-demand bassists on the New York Jazz scene today, will be the featured musician at the Seventh Annual UNCW Jazz Festival to be held on Friday, March 31 and Saturday, April 1. He will be a featured soloist with the UNCW Jazz Ensembles at 8 p.m. on Saturday in Kenan Auditorium.

General admission for the Saturday evening concert will be $4.00, senior citizens and children $2.00, UNCW students free with a valid I.D.

Coolman will perform bass solo features with the 7 O'clock Jazz Ensemble such as Thad Jones' Three and One and Duke Ellington's composition Jack the Bear, which was originally written for bassist Jimmy Blanton.

Other compositions performed by the 7 O'clock Jazz Ensemble will be Ray Brown's The Opener, Matt Harris' Taylor Made and trombone feature, I'm Getting ### Sentimental Over You.

Also performing will be the award-winning UNCW Jazz Combo. Due to the Combo's selection as a National Finalist in the First Annual Musicfest Competition, the UNCW Jazz Festival has become an affiliated regional qualifying festival for this annual national jazz festival. The UNCW Jazz Festival's association with Musicfest has made it one of the most prestigious jazz festivals in North Carolina and its neighboring states.

On Friday, Coolman will critique jazz groups from 1-5 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium. Performances will include junior high, high school, college, and professional groups from throughout the state. Saturday morning will begin with a bass/rhythm section and improvisation clinic from 10 a.m. to 12 p.m. in Kenan Hall room 114.

Coolman has performed, recorded and toured world-wide with such jazz luminaries as James Moody, Art Farmer, Terry Gibbs, Slide Hampton, Benny Golson, Stan Getz, Lionel Hampton, Benny Goodman, and many others. In addition, he has also recorded for movie and television sound tracks as well as played in Broadway productions. Todd is also active in the field of jazz education. He holds a masters degree from the Manhattan School of Music and has been on the jazz studies faculty at William Paterson College of New Jersey since 1982. As an author, Todd has had articles published in Downbeat and the Jazz Educators Journal, and has written a book entitled "The Bass Tradition".

Wrightsville Race Worth Big Bucks

(PRESS RELEASE) Forty-foot catamarans and Hobie 21 sailboats will crowd Wrightsville Beach April 6-9 for the season's first event in the Salem ProSail Series, the Carolina Cup.

The 1989 Salem ProSail Series, the first professional sailing series in the country, awards the richest purses and point fund to professional skippers in the world. The $65,000 Carolina Cup is the first of six national events in 1989 and will award points toward ProSail 40 and Hobie 21 championships.

ProSail 40s, the fastest closed-course sailboats in the world, are similar to European Formula 40s. The 40-foot multihulls weigh approximately 4,000 pounds and sail speeds up to 30 knots offwind.

Hobie 21s, the only Hobie sailboats designed specifically for racing, are 21-foot catamarans with a spinnaker. All Hobie 21s are identical so racing skill is critical.

All Salem ProSail Series events consist of seven races based on an aggregate, low-point scoring system. Short, tight courses are raced close to shore for ideal spectator viewing.

Defending Salem ProSail 40 champion Randy Smyth of Huntington Beach, Calif., will return to the series sailing his IMI Super Lube ProSail 40. Smyth, the first Formula 40 champion in Europe in 1986, won all three Salem ProSail Series events last year in Newport, R.I., San Francisco and Miami.

In addition, he declined an invitation to compete in the 1988 Olympics to compete on the crew for the America's Cup.

International Star champion and 1987 America's Cup semifinalist Tom Blackaller of Sausalito, Calif., will also return to the 1989 Salem ProSail Series. Blackaller completed in his first event last year at the Salem ProSail Series/San Francisco and finished second.

"I love these boats," Blackaller said. "They're so fast. I've never sailed anything like them."

Event headquarters will be located at the Blockade Runner Hotel on Wrightsville Beach. Hobie 21 qualifying and ProSail 40 practice racing begins Friday at 11 a.m.

Saturday, four races in both classes will be held beginning at 11 a.m. with winner's circle presentation following at approximately 3 p.m.

Thalians present mystery

(Press Release) The Thalian Association, Wilmington's community theatre, will stage the Agatha Christie mystery, THE MOUSETRAP, March 29 through April 1 and 3 p.m. and Sunday, April 2, at 3 p.m. at the Jacob's Run entertainment complex at 208 Market Street.

The play, the longest-running mystery in recent theatre history, is directed by Gwendolyn Williams and features an English country manner designed by John Bob Wallace setting.

The cast of eight volunteer performers includes: Jennifer Terry-Baker, R.J. Carlson, Bryan Partin, Tina Baldrige, Phil Loch, Lynette Ashby, Don Squires, and Mark Yach.

Technical director for the play is Chuck Tedder, stage manager is Tonya Spencer. Cyndi Black is assistant stage manager and properties are being handled by Judy Davies and Jan Piner.

Ticket reservations may be made by calling the box office at 763-3398 or 763-9328 daily, Monday through Saturday from 10 a.m. until 5:30 p.m.

UNCW Students will have the opportunity Saturday to receive personalized shirts from artist Stuart Stephens at The Sound Shop.

Artist Gives Personal Touch

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

Famous artist Stuart Stephens will be painting shirts at The Sound Shop at the Marketplace Mall Saturday, April 1 from 9:00 a.m. until 3:00 p.m. as part of the store's grand opening and in conjunction with Greek Week activities. Stephens has designed the shirts for the event.

Five hundred shirts have been printed and will be given to students displaying their UNCW ID at the store on Saturday. With a $10 purchase Stephens will personalize the shirts free.

Gibson Guitars commissioned Stephens to design a number of limited edition guitars. He has painted for President and Mrs. Reagan and has done the official Kentucky Derby shirts for two years in a row.

Stephens' passion is upbeat designs which he paints on articles of clothing such as sweat shirts, boxer shorts, canvas tennis shoes or any other predominantly white garment. He began painting clothing 10 years ago and has painted over 300,000 shirts.

Stephens uses the inspiration of other art media such as television and books in addition to his own extraordinary talent to create articles of clothing that capture the personality of the individual. He incorporates the person's hobbies and interests into the work. People walk away not only with a Stevens' original but also with their own personalized garment.

The Sound Shop will also have a car wash and Surf 107 will have a live remote on the scene. Prizes will be given including cassettes and compact disks. The Marketplace is located behind Chi Chi's on College Road.

Festival Promotes Awareness

(PRESS RELEASE) The UNCW Campus Awareness Organization will be sponsoring its First Annual Awareness Festival scheduled for Saturday, April 8 and Sunday, April 9, 1989, at the Residence Life Gazebo Field at UNCW.

A free, non-profit outdoor event, this spring festival will provide individuals a chance to discover opportunities available in the public sector to convert concerns for the future of the world into positive, effective action.

"People, especially high school and college students, will be able to talk to individuals from groups such as the Listening Project, Peaceworks, Cape Fear Literacy Council and the Cape Fear Substance Abuse Center, to see if they want to direct their concerns, energy and academic knowledge to working towards issues that touch all of us," says Jeff Hinkle, co-founder of the UNCW Campus Awareness Organization.

The festival will be a two-day event that will begin at 10 a.m. and end 6 p.m. on both Saturday and Sunday. It will include live entertainment (music, poetry reading, dance, etc.), guest speakers on various topics of community and global concerns, vendors of handicrafted goods and homemade foods, and information booths by various social and environmental groups.

Entertainers, speakers or organizations interested in participating in or contributing to this program should contact Brenda Boyle at 791-4481 or Jeff Hinkle at 343-9691 no later than Friday, March 31, 1989.

This event is open to the public.

Pulitzer Prize Winning Columnist To Speak

(UNCW News) Pulitzer Prize winning columnist Ellen Goodman will be the special guest speaker at The University of North Carolina at Wilmington in its 1989 celebration of National Women's History Month.

"A Matter of Values" is the topic of her talk to be presented at 8 p.m., Tuesday, April 4, in Cameron Hall Auditorium on the UNCW campus. Sponsored by the UNCW Faculty Women's Network, the presentation is free and the public is invited to attend.

Goodman, who often writes from a feminist perspective, is associate editor of the Boston Globe. Her twice-weekly column is syndicated nationally through the Washington Post Writers Group to more than 400 newspapers.

The topic of her talk at UNCW, "A Matter of Values," was selected because her columns often focus on "the underlying values by which this country exists."

"It is certainly not cozy to be talking about abortion, the vast social changes in the way men and women lead their lives and deal with each other, about children, about the whole category of subjects I deal with. Those subjects are certainly not cozy; they are pretty uncomfortable," she said in an interview with the publication "Contemporary Authors."

She began writing a column for the Globe in 1970; in 1973-74 she spent a year at Harvard as a Neiman Fellow, then returned to the Globe as a full-time

"Contemporary Authors" interview, Goodman said that writing a column differs from feature reporting because, as a columnist, "You're totally self-staring, totally dependent on your own ideas... You're constantly having to think and figure out what you think. It involves much more pressure than doing feature stories."

"With feature stories very often you wait until someone gives you the idea, and you're not putting yourself on the line all the time, either. Whenever I write something, that's me out there, in a way it isn't when you're a feature story writer."

In addition to being known as a columnist, Goodman has recently been featured in Public Broadcasting Network's "Ethics in America" series.

Goodman was graduated from

Azalea Fest Offers Wide Variety

THE SEAHAWK • MARCH 30, 1989 • PAGE 10

Frankie Valli & The Four Seasons will play for Queen Azalea's Coronation Pageant Saturday, April 15 in Trask Coliseum.

(Press Release) The North Carolina Azalea Festival at Wilmington began in 1948 as a "small scale" three-day event, and has grown each year until it has become one of the major springtime festivals in the nation. This April 13-16 is the forty-second anniversary of the Azalea Festival. Today, it is a four-day festival featuring a wide variety of events and programs.

This year's festival includes the world's largest free, three-day horse show, the Clyde Beatty-Cole Brothers Circus, tours of homes in downtown historic Wilmington, and two concerts. In addition, there will be an air show April 9 with the Thunderbirds.

The talented Daryl Hall and John Oates will perform in concert for the festival Thursday, April 13 at 8:00 p.m. in Trask Coliseum. Their recent LP release is titled oh yeah!, and features currently familiar singles like "Everything Your Heart Desires," and "Missed Opportunity."

From 1980 until 1985, Hall and Oates enjoyed a string of platinum LP's (Voices, Private Eyes, H<sub>2</sub>O, Rock 'n' Soul Part 1), and hit singles like "Kiss On My List," "Maneater," "I Can't Go For

That (No Can Do)," "Say It Isn't So," "Private Eyes," and "Adult Education."

Rebecca Arthur, star of "Perfect Strangers," will be this year's Azalea Queen. Her Coronation Pageant on Saturday, April 15 at Trask Coliseum will feature Frankie Valli & The Four Seasons.

Valli's uncommon style and gift for performing a variety of songs, account for a career spanning nearly three decades. Today, Frankie Valli & The Four Seasons are extremely popular performers in Las Vegas, Atlantic City, and on college campuses. Tickets for the Coronation Pageant and the concert are $20.00.

Festival president, Bill Cameron, says, "We certainly have been fortunate this year in booking such quality acts. With Hall and Oates on Thursday night and Frankie Valli & The Four Seasons on Saturday night, we feel confident that North Carolina and thousands of out-of-state residents will be eager to attend these performances."

For more information, contact the Azalea Festival Office at 763-0905.

Registration is open for the Azalea Festival Miller Lite Beach Volleyball Tournament at the Wrightsville Beach Park Office.

North Carolina's oldest and largest co-ed beach volleyball tournament will offer a new two-day format featuring up to 36 co-ed teams in three divisions, including a novice division for teams with little or no experience.

Round-robin play will be held on Saturday, April 15th and the elimination play-offs will be held on Sunday, April 16th on the beach strand of Crystal Pier.

The entry fee is $50/per team and at least two females must be playing at all times.

This sanctioned Azalea festival event is sponsored by Coastal Beverage Company and Wrightsville Beach Parks & Recreation Department. For more information, contact the Park Office at 256-4744 on Monday thru Friday from 9:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.

REVERENCE from p. 3

After he received a standing ovation, Hitchens proceeded to give background on the company he works for, Burroughs Wellcome, and tell about the many gracious patients that his agents had cured.

In closing, Hitchens shared his feelings about the award.

"All of our work is not only directed to scientific, but to the humanitarian objectives of Albert Schweitzer. I am very proud to accept this Albert Schweitzer Award," said Hitchens.

Morton then introduced Roland Quillet, Swiss Vice Consul General, to present the humanities award to Dr. Boris Luban-Plazza.

Luban-Plazza, a world authority in psychosomatic medicine, also shared his admiration for Schweitzer after a standing ovation in his honor.

"Dr. Schweitzer inspired me as a boy, of not only being a physician, but also he inspired the content of my life," said Luban-Plazza.

Luban-Plazza explained the ideologies upon which his practice is based, and thanked everyone present while Beverly Sills prepared for her award.

Morton described Sills, prize winner for her musical contributions, as being "completely unselfish with her fame, raising untold millions for the March of Dimes."

He then introduced Maria Fisher to present the award to Sills.

After the third standing ovation of the evening, Beverly Sills, renowned opera star, gave her very moving acceptance speech.

Sills began her speech by recounting her beginnings in the world of opera and then presented her reasons for accepting the Albert Schweitzer Award for music.

"I did accept this award for whom it was being named...to be honored in the name of a man who so cared about his fellow man, that he was literally a one man peace corp...a man who felt that one man could make a difference, that was just an honor that was too great for me to pass up. I feel that I can influence people only through example...that was said by Dr. Albert Schweitzer," said Sills.

Before the special guest was named, Clair Rozier, UNCW organist and music professor, presented Prelude and Fugue in G Major BWV 541, J.S. Bach.

Martin W. McCann named the special guest who was Dr. Albert Schweitzer's daughter, Rensha Schweitzer-Miller.

"To honor outstanding individuals in these three domains is a very fitting, and for me, very moving tribute to my father," said Schweitzer-Miller.

Of the three award winners Schweitzer-Miller said, "They are outstanding, not only in their chosen field, but also in their humanitarian endeavors."

McCann thanked Schweitzer-Miller for making her first trip to Wilmington and allowing her father to be honored in this way.

"To have her with us this week gives us even stronger motivations to continue to build on the tradition of these international prizes," said McCann.

McCann later announced that locally and statewide, the week of March 19th would be proclaimed "Dr. Albert Schweitzer Week."

To end the evening in ceremonial fashion McCann surprised the audience with a telegram that he had received from President George Bush earlier in the day. The telegram congratulated the award winners and commended everyone involved in the ceremonies endeavor.

"This is the best award ceremony we've ever had!" said Shinn.

"I would hope Albert Schweitzer International Prizes will always be a part of UNCW in order to provide a chance for [young people] to meet successful and great people."

Luban-Plazza Wins Humanities Award

KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

Dr. Boris Luban-Plazza was the prize recipient for the Albert Schweitzer award in humanities.

During his visit, Luban-Plazza repeatedly told his audiences of the impact that Schweitzer had on him as a boy and remained with him until the present.

Luban-Plazza is a world authority in Psychosomatic medicine who focuses on treating the "whole of patient."

Luban-Plazza feels that a more human relationship is necessary between physician and patient. He therefore, treats the entire family along with the patient and believes that there is a deeper connection between social and psychosomatic medicine.

This idea is the focus of the Balint method, one which Dr. Luban-Plazza treats great interest in.

Luban-Plazza was born in St. Gallen, Switzerland and completed his studies in Geneva, Basel, and Bern.

He not only serves as founder and leader of the International Balint Conferences, but also is President of the Commission on Health and the Family in Switzerland, and has published numerous books on psychosomatic medicine.

Andrea Piner, UNCW Ambassador, and host of Dr. Luban-Plazza, said of him, "Even though he had a heavy accent and was sometimes difficult to understand, what he said was interesting and sometimes quite humorous. He truly loved meeting people."

Remember that the audience isn't there to pick you apart or throw things. They came and sometimes even paid to see you perform. They came to see you because they can't do it themselves."

"You can really start whenever you feel the most comfortable. Age is not a very heavy factor. I began when I was seven because I knew it was what I wanted to do. But I have sung with people who are sixty years old and didn't decide that they wanted to sing until they were fifty."

Another question was, "Does singing a different vocal part or role, which is higher or lower than you usually sing, cause damage to your voice?"

Sills replied, "Most definitely. If you feel uncomfortable with the apex or depth of a role, then you are straining your voice. Even if you continue vocal training and your range increases, know your limits and you will have a long-lived voice."

One edgy-looking student asked, "How do you get over nervousness?" Sills replied, "The biggest thing is to have faith and confidence in yourself."

Wednesday 22nd was a special day for music enthusiasts in Wilmington and at UNCW. Beverly Sills, prominent opera star of the United States and Europe, came to UNCW to accept the Albert Schweitzer Prize for Music.

All present at her informal talk session gained a great deal of knowledge concerning singing, acting, and music careers.

Sills was very generous with advice. She answered many questions from her audience.

Out of the many questions that were asked, students seemed most concerned with the best age to begin singing, the damage that can come from singing, and how to relieve stage-fright.

When asked the most appropriate age to begin a career in singing, Sills replied,

Ralph Parker, Director of Minority affairs emphasized the validity of both points of view.

"Vice Chancellor Bryan had his rationale on the decision he made and students had presented rationale in regards to putting on the concert. On each side there is a strong argument," said Parker.

"I'm not sure that its a matter of someone being right or someone being wrong, but a matter of basing your opinion on the facts as you interpret them," continued Parker.

Taking each member's input into consideration, Vice Chancellor Bryan responded to each concern presented to the administration by the BSAC.

The BSAC responded positively to seven of the eight proposals including a proposal for a review of the campus police department's policies and procedures by a subcommittee of the Human Relations Advisory Committee. Other proposals welcomed were for written clarification of the security personnel's duties at dances, and the arrangements for police training sessions involving the police and the community.

"I felt that the students reacted very well to the administration's recommendations. We had some minor adjustments but for the most part it was very successful," said Skinner.

The only opposition the administration faced was in regard to the final demand by the BSAC to provide a replacement concert of the same caliber as the one which was cancelled.

"They told us that we could still have the rap concert as long as the security rider was changed, or if the bands could be picked up by another agent. This is the same thing as saying that we still cannot have the concert," said Malcolm Coley, a member of the BSAC.

"With the exception of the replacement concert and the funding issue, it seems to me that we should not have had to ask for something we should already rightfully have as students at this institution," continued Coley.

Parker pointed out one of the sources of conflict between the administration and the black students of this campus is a lack of communication.

"I hope that in the future, to avoid this type of thing, that better communication will take place between the administration and the students, because if carefully planned, something like this can be worked out," finished Parker.

UNCW Tree Planting By Schweitzer Medals For Artistry Set

Imogene Coca, two-time Emmy winner and star of NBC's "Show of Shows", along with many other nationally known Americans, will plant their memorial trees on the campus UNCW promptly at 9 AM., Friday morning, April 7th in front of the cafeteria under construction.

Nine recipients for the Schweitzer Medal for Artistry will plant their individual trees in a gala ceremony, followed by a reception which will be followed by refreshments and a continental breakfast for all in attendance, including "Beef in a Biscuit."

The Schweitzer concerts take place April 5, 6 and 7th in the historic First Presbyterian Church in Wilmington at 8 PM each evening. Tickets are $10 for Wednesday evening, 20 for Thursday's scrollnight, and patrons for Friday April 7th are $75.00 per ticket.

Proceeds from the Schweitzer concerts help to finance the Schweitzer International prizes which are hosted by UNCW each year. The concerts in years past, have raised nearly $25,000 for the Schweitzer prizes.

Other winners include: North Carolina artist Bob Timberlake, Wilmington painter Frederick B. Graham, Wilmington natives Brian Head, Rensha Reagan Stone, Mary Eunice Troy, Dr. R.V. Fulk, UNC-W's Dr. Richard Deas and John Gilmore of the Metropolitan Opera.

Tickets are on sale at Azalea Festival offices in Long Leaf Mall.

Intrigue and nervous excitement spread across the town of Wilmington and UNCW campus upon finding out that the Schweitzer Prize ceremonies would include a "very special mystery guest."

On Sunday March 19, it was announced that Rensha Schweitzer-Miller, daughter of Dr. Albert Schweitzer, would be attending the ceremonies at UNCW.

The special guest made her first trip to Wilmington from her U.S. home Lawonia, Georgia, to speak on behalf of her late father. Dr. Albert Schweitzer died in 1965.

Rensha Schweitzer-Miller was born in Alsace, studied in Germany, and worked in her father's hospital laboratory in Lambaréne, Gabon. After his death, she stayed as an administrator until 1970.

During Dr. Schweitzer's death, Dr. David Miller of the Center for Disease Control, consulted with his illness. Miller later married Rensha.

The couple have continued to carry out the tradition of Schweitzer "reverence for life."

She quoted her late father as saying, "Reverence for life" comprises our whole ethic of love in its deepest and highest sense. It is a source of constant renewal for the individual and for mankind."

To this, Schweitzer-Miller replied, "I think these words are more relevant today than ever."

Hitchings Wins for Medical Contributions

KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

"Humble," "genius," and "unselfish" were words used on the campus of UNCW when students were asked to describe Dr. George Hitchings.

Hitchings, the Schweitzer Prize recipient for medicine, shared his many accomplishments with students and faculty members Wednesday afternoon, March 22.

Hitchings spoke to his audience about the many drugs that he had been "interested in." All present knew that Hitchings had been more than just interested in these agents, for it was he that discovered them.

Hitchings discovered new compounds for drugs that have helped in the treatment of gout, malaria, leukemia, and herpes. It was also he that is credited with laying the groundwork for the development of AZT, a possible treatment for the AIDS treatment.

Not only did he prove himself a genius to students in the medical field, but he also proved his tremendous skills as a humanitarian and speaker.

Hitchings begged of students to call him George, encouraged them with their future in medicine, and lectured on a subject pertinent to students, sexually transmitted diseases(STDs).

Presently, Hitchings is working in Raleigh as the scientist emeritus at Burroughs Wellcome and president of the Burroughs Wellcome Fund, an organization that furthers biochemical studies. He was also co-recipient for the Nobel Prize for Medicine in 1988.

With all of his contributions to the medical field, Hitchings is most proud of his treatment for leukemia. His treatment for leukemia has helped the cure rate in children rise from a mere twenty-percent to an unbelievable eighty-percent.

"I have lived long enough to see children through leukemia treatment. It is a most heartwarming experience," said Hitchings.

Way Out In (W)right Field

Chris Wright
Sports Editor

My Kind of D.U.I.

The kind folks out at the Cape Golf and Racquet Club were kind enough to mail me an invitation to a press day luncheon they are hosting which will serve to prelude an upcoming professional tournament at the club.

The brochure continued. Refreshments- which at functions such as this generally mean martinis- will be served promptly following the press conference and then anyone still able to swing a club and say "Arnold Palmer" at the same time will be permitted to play a round of golf on the house.

I thought that was a most gracious offer. Obviously, these people have never seen me play golf.

I thought it might be a wise investment of my time to go ahead and sneak a peak at the course, and maybe play a couple of practice holes to help lower the embarrassment factor I will surely face.

So I packed my bags, brought two cases of balls, a pitcher full of martini (strictly for psychological reasons. I needed to ensure that the conditions I practice under are identical to the real thing.), and a rifle to ward off any intruding reptiles hell-bent on making me their late night snack.

I think I played pretty well. I'm not totally positive, though, because at midnight, finding your ball can be extremely difficult, despite their optic yellow color.

Only two times did I mistakenly swing at a resting crocodile whose bright illuminating eyes were mistaken for my ball.

Obviously, I did not penalize myself for losing balls. I would have easily found them had it not been for the darkness, and besides, there was no way I was going after the one I sent through a bordering houses window, regardless of the time.

I was thankful, however. Those precious souls, at 2 a.m. no less, got up a lit up the 14th fairway for me, firing only two bullets in my direction.

The cops showed up, and you know how bright their lights are. I played 15, 16 and 17 feeling like I was playing a night game at Yankee Stadium.

Eventually, I'm sad to report, the good times came to an abrupt halt.

I was teeing off of 18, a picturesque 400 yd par four, when a stumpy little bald man poked me on the shoulder. My follow through knocked him, knocking him to the ground, but not until he saw my errand drive.

Placing the handcuffs on me and shoving me in the police car I asked him what the charge was, figuring it would be disturbing the peace, of trespassing.

No such luck. With a grin as wide as the Grand Canyon, he said "Son, I don't have any other alternative than to charge you with 'driving' under the influence."

I sat, guilty as charged.

Happy April Fools Day!!

Softball Seahawks Conquer Pirates

BY MAI NGUYEN
SPORTS WRITER

The leaf has turned for our softball Seahawks as they now hold a mid-season record of 18-7, a tremendous improvement from last season's.

In their fifth year of fast pitch softball, the Ladyhawks exhibit vitality, acute reflexes and high stamina (they play double-headers against each team). Coach Maggie St. Ledger believes that the "good chemistry and confidence" accounts for part of their success thus far.

"The consistent pitching, better offensive plays and good hitting also contributes to this year's success," she further adds. The versatility of the players is also another key factor in the strength of the team.

The players are able to assume other roles in difficult situations. St. Ledger also comments that although they once relied on a few good batters, they have expanded their skills so that now many hitters are very efficient. Freshman Yuki Henry has lived true to this fact as she holds a batting average of .528.

Another outstanding player is junior Kim Yates, who has 21 RBIs and a batting average of .313.

The softball Seahawks showed their exemplary talent in Tuesday's double-header against East Carolina University. In the first game, the Hawks were able to hold the Pirates off until the seventh inning in which they were tied 2-2.

Then, ECU's players began to have an unexpected surge of energy as they scored four more points, ending the game at 2-6. By the second game, the Seahawks ousted their opponents despite their first loss, making the final score 5-2. Second baseman Julia Boseman was quick to add that "No one has ever beat us twice in a double-header." "We also have great team unity and the pitching has improved," Boseman remarks. Pitcher Rita Scott also believes that the team has significantly progressed, making for a quicker and versatile force. The Lady Seahawks will host the Bobby Vincent Conference this Saturday when eight teams will face each other. Hopefully, the success of the softball team will continue to lead them to victory.

Indoor Soccer Invades Hanover Gym

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

The ball is rebounded off the boards at midfield, a quick leading pass is made to the streaking right winger. He jukes the lone defender at the top of the goal box and sends a rocketing shot past a sprawled goalie. He scores!!

This is the action of the fast pace, quick shooting, high scoring of Intramural Seahawk Indoor Soccer '89. For the third year the intramural program has sponsored the highly competitive indoor soccer in Hanover Hall. What has been termed by many of its participants as an "Explosion of maximum intensity" certainly lives up to its billing.

Indoor soccer is quite different from its outdoor counterpart. Each team has six players on the floor, to move offensive up the 72 ft long floor. Games have two referees and have twenty-five minute halves. There are usually two forwards, one midfielder, two fullbacks, and a very brave goalie. The object is obvious, to escape your defender and score but with the indoor game an exciting extra dimension is added, walls on all four sides of the court.

Not just ordinary walls but teammates, goal assistants, and first rate defenders. Balls are often kicked against the wall at an angle so that the offensive player can get around his opponent and recontrol the ball after he goes around him. The wall is also used to set up goal scoring opportunities. A ball is usually kicked hard against the wall close to the opponents goal so that a running teammate can collect the rebound and power a shot through space vacated by the confused goalie.

"You can do anything you want. He's a teammate and you can be very inventive with your plays," said Bill Carmichael, Commissioner of Intramural Soccer.

However, the boards (walls) can help you clear the ball downfield when surrounded by opposing players. "The sport is alot like hockey," said Carmichael, one of the founders of the indoor league and coach of the "Homeboys".

He is right in more ways than one. Besides running substitutions of players, bodies in the deep corner with the ball are often seen kissing the hard wood of the solid wall by a strong defensive check. Yet the sport as a whole is still surprisingly non-contact. "The referees are really tight on their calls so that the aggressiveness doesn't get carried away," commented Carmichael.

In indoor soccer you need a strong passing game in order to be successful. Scoring happens much faster and more often than in the outdoor counterpart. A typical game tally would be 9-7.

"It is very important to have a strong center half who can control the tempo of the game," said Carmichael. A good team has to be physically fit for this sport because it involves more running than outdoor. One second your team could be charging down toward the enemy goal mouth and the next second scrambling back on defense to prevent a score. "It's an offensive game; you can score from anywhere. Defense is very difficult," said Carmichael.

However, the person with the toughest job on the floor has to be the goalie. This intense individual has the pleasant task of blocking point-blank booming shots. Even though his goal is much smaller to defend he has to learn how to play the boards so he's not out of position to stop a shot.

This is very difficult due to the unpredictability of the bouncing ball.

Currently, the indoor league is composed of eight teams and two leagues. The top two finishers in each league play in a winners bracket and the bottom two in each league plays in a loser bracket. Then all the teams are seeded and participated in a 6 game tournament at the end of the year to determine the overall champion of the indoor sport. Each team is guaranteed seven games. All games are held Monday thru Thursday at 7:00 and 8:00 p.m.. All interested individuals are asked to come out and play the fastest sport at UNCW.

UNCW Track Team Runs Away with Records

FROM STAFF REPORTS

The Seahawk Track Club participated in the Raleigh High March 24 and 25. The meet was hosted by North Carolina State University and sixty school attended from all over the Southeast. The Seahawks performed well and set several track club records.

Shawn Britton set a new track club record in the 10,000 meter run with a 30:46. Layne Fuller, David Simmons, and Beth Holt all set personal best in the 5,000 meter run. Fuller and Holt both set new track club records. In the 400 meter run, Peggy Bolton set a new club record with a swift timing of 60.8. Dan Scott was clocked at 52.2 and Jeff King at 54.2 in the men's 400 meter run.

The Lady Seahawk's 4 x 800 meter relay composed of Jamie Oxendine, Peggy Bolton, Sara Harris, and Lalonnie Walker set a new course record with a blazing 10:20. Walker also set a personal mark in the 3,000 meter run with a 11:16.

The Seahawk Track Club is now preparing for the home meet on April 7 and 8 at the Harold Green Track and Field Complex.

Reid to Announce Transfer to UNCW

McPherson: "We've Turned the Corner"

Way Out In
(W)right

Sports EditorBig Athlete's-
Big Bucks

Now that UNCW has lured Carolina's J.R. Reid into attending our fine institution, and hopefully gracing Trask Coliseum with his immense derrière and talent, we are forced to view our Hawks in an unfamiliar role—as conference favorites.

That has a nice ring.

Granted, next year's squad will be without two of the best players in school history, Larry Houzer and Antonio Howard, and a third, ever-steady Greg Bender, but the addition of Reid should more than atone for the losses.

Teamed with the CAA's top returning backcourt tandem, sharpshooter Brannon Lancaster (he led the CAA in 3-point accuracy) and a more mature Joe Cherry, Reid should provide the missing link between UNCW and post-season play.

His talent is well revered, both throughout the ACC as well as the country. As a prep he was arguably the most sought-after player in the nation, and if he decides to go hardship in all likelihood will be among the first five picks taken.

In addition to his on-court contributions, he will prove to be a valuable asset off the court as well. Home Team Sports will most assuredly cover more of UNCW's games. That translates into increased revenue, both for the school as well as the conference.

Closer to home, the seats at Trask Coliseum, once idle and silent, will become boisterous and supportive and what the hell, his play might even force a smile or two from Coach McPherson, who is in his last year of a four-year contract.

The extra season tickets sold translate into increased revenue which, if channeled properly, will be used to upgrade the various athletic facilities of our campus.

With the onslaught of season-ticket holders comes the lofty contributions of the Alumni, who may or may not be somehow involved in Reid's arrival.

Season-ticket holder's generally have children who grow up spoiled and like little things like J.R. Reid stuffed toys. Those little toys cost money. Additional revenue.

Believe it or not, some high school kids actually choose the college of their choice based upon the athletic prowess of that school. With Reid we are virtually guaranteed of attaining a certain level of success in the CAA and that will help draw in classmates.

Classmates do not come cheaply. They arrive to the tune of $2,000 apiece. Are we beginning to see a clear-cut pattern?

Isn't it amazing that simply signing a franchise type athlete such as J.R. benefits the entire school.

I hope you're not surprised or alarmed to hear of such news. This system, sad to say, is quickly becoming the rule. Here briefly, then is an abbreviated guide for beginning coaches wishing to cash in on franchise players.

1. Recruit big-time athlete. (Offer relatives jobs. Involve alumni only when necessary.)

2. Give him a full-scholarship. (Additional cash and/or cars may be required.)

3. Pray to God he passes all courses and is eligible to compete. (No worry, your university offers degrees in football, remember.)

4. Try to impress recruit with the beautiful campus. (Make sure the beauty is not the Governor's daughter.)

5. Finalize deal with signed letter-of-intent. (An "X" by name will suffice.)

CHAPEL HILL—The University of North Carolina basketball program is expected to announce the transfer of junior All-American J. R. Reid, Saturday during a scheduled press conference at the Student Activity Center, according to Head Coach Dean Smith.

"(J.R.) came to me following the UCLA game," Smith said, "and told me he wanted out. He said he could not play where he was wanted."

Reid sat out the Bruin game as punishment stemming from his breaking the team-imposed 1 a.m. curfew.

"We have very few rules on this team," Smith continued. "The senior captains made the rules prior to the season. They were personally consulted. They made the final decision on whether or not J.R. would play. They all agreed. A rule is a rule."

The 6'10" junior is expected to announce his transfer to UNC-Wilmington, according to a team spokesman.

"J.R. narrowed his choices down to four teams and gave the list to coach Smith after his suspension," he said. "N.C. State, Virginia, Georgetown and UNC-Wilmington were the schools he listed. He asked coach Smith what he thought about each of the schools. UNCW rated very high."

Reid visited the UNCW campus during spring break.

"He was very impressed with the area, community, the facilities and coaching staff," the spokesman continued. "because (the UNCW students) were on spring break he didn't really get to see a lot of the people or campus life, but what he did see, he enjoyed."

It has been speculated that Reid might enter this spring's NBA draft, as a hardship.

"It's still a possibility," Smith said. "J.R. is in a position to make a lot of money either now or in the future. He definitely has a future in the NBA."

Reid's choosing UNCW is not as big a surprise as some may think. Just last week his father was hired as an assistant basketball coach for the Seahawks and his family moved to Wilmington several months ago.

"J.R.'s dad going to Wilmington had a lot to do with it," Smith said. "It is safe to say that UNCW was not in the running until his father was hired there."

Reid's signing with the Hawk's could not have come at a better time. UNCW recently lost two all-conference performers, Larry Houzer and Antonio Howard to graduation. Reid is expected to fill the vacancy left by Houzer.

"J.R.'s signing came as a total shock," UNCW Head Coach Robert McPherson acknowledged. "When we signed his dad to the contract, we were looking for someone with name recognition for recruiting purposes. We had no idea that J.R. was planning on leaving Carolina. I am very excited about next year. I see his signing as a turning point for our program."

Reid, who averaged nearly 16 points a game for the Tarheels, figures to be the pre-season CAA player, due to the graduation of Blue Edwards and Kenny Sanders, and should help the conference gain added credibility.

Reid joins former Maryland Terrapins Lefty Driesell and guard Steve Hood as former ACC participants who have jumped to the CAA.

"Obviously, this is a tremendous boost for our conference," UNCW Athletic Director Bill Brooks said. "With the post-season success of Richmond and Navy in the past years and George Mason receiving their first bid this year, it's only a matter of time before people start noticing our record."

The CAA currently holds a .306 winning percentage in post-season NCAA tournament action, eighth best among all conferences.

Our Newest Seahawk!!

J. R. Reid (above) is expected to announce Saturday, April 1, that he is transferring to UNCW due to his suspension from a prior game.

"High" Flying Hawk to be Caged

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

In a bizarre series of events it was discovered that the Seahawk mascot was involved in the selling or using of Crack Cocaine!! The discovery was made accidentally in a routine check of the Seahawk uniform.

"I was trying to clip up some loose string from the inside of the uniform when I felt a lump. This didn't bother me at first because the uniform is bulky but I soon found another lump just a few feet under the first one. I thought this was peculiar and called my supervisor over to look at the uniform," said Penny Seemer. What they found loosely stitched in the inner lining of the uniform were two cellophane bags containing about $1,000 worth of Crack.

"We couldn't believe what we discovered, this has never happened before in the 10 years that the University has had an official mascot," exclaimed Barbara Bituwiis. The drugs were handed over to the university police who then called in the local area police to help work with them on the case. Although no official charges have been levied against the Seahawk mascot an investigation is presently under way.

The entire uniform is being shipped to a police laboratory to be tested for fingerprints and to see if the feathering contains any other narcotic materials. The two cellophane bags both contained small six inch needles that are commonly used by users to shoot up. There also were freshly rolled cigarette forms of the drug. The Wilmington police are keeping a tight lid on the progress on the drug investigation.

They claim that they don't want to tip any potential suspects off. Some inside data was divulged by an anonymous police source who stated that they (the police) were going to question all related parties who had access to the uniform. The prime suspects if this information is correct would be the Seahawk mascot and the UNCW Cheerleading squad.

A interrogation involving the Varsity squad of cheerleaders would surely cancel their trip to the National Cheerleading Championships in San Antonio, Texas. The Seahawk mascot, who's name is being withheld by police request will possibly face expulsion from UNCW by Dean William Franklin. "I will have to wait until the police issue an official charge against the student in question before I will render judgement on his status at UNCW. I will say if the person is found guilty of drug trafficking that severe disciplinary measures will be enforced," said Franklin.

The University handbook clearly states on page 36, VIII-2 Policy and Program on Illegal Drugs. "The illegal use, possession, sale, delivery...will not be tolerated and may be the grounds for immediate suspension or dismissal of students, faculty members, administrators, and other university employees."

Seahawk entertains fans at Trask Coliseum.

Attempts were made to contact the Seahawk mascot at his residence for more information but all questions were refused. He claimed that no statements could be made to any reporters until he talked to his lawyer. If he is charged and convicted he faces a maximum sentence of seven years with a parole option.

"I can't bring myself to believe he would do such a thing to disgrace the university and the cheerleading profession!!," said Denise Pepper, a former UNCW cheerleader.

Reports through the grapevine seem to suggest that the police believe the mascot suit was used as storage space for the drugs. However, Officer Wayne Brickly insisted no possibility has been cast aside.

The Seahawk has long been a representative for Toys for Tots, Food for the Homeless, Just Say No to Drugs, and other charitable organizations. He has been seen at numerous activities around campus and sporting events.

The ultimate cheerleader for the Seahawks appears to have had his feathers finally clipped. Our symbol of good times and pride has apparently opted for greener avenues with fewer feathers. The investigation will continue until the dealer is found out. This is a sad day for Hawksters everywhere!

Fletcher to Discuss AIDS

Dr. Suzy Fletcher, chair of the graduate program of the school of nursing at Indiana State University, will be on campus April 11 to participate in a program sponsored by the Chancellor's Standing Committee Regarding AIDS and the office of health promotion. Event begin at noon on the UU lawn with the "Spread No Evil" Monkey Troupe; at 12:30 Dr. Fletcher will hold a question/answer session in the Hawk's Nest and at 4 in HO-111 she will speak to health care professionals. That evening she will discuss "Living With AIDS: The Challenge of the 90's" at 8 in Cameron Hall Auditorium Facility - please inform your classes that student validation forms for attendance will be available at all events.

Organizations Get Your Budget Worksheet!

The SGA allocation process for 1989-90 school year is now open. All qualified organizations need to pick up the new SGA Budget Worksheet in the SGA office and have them turned in by Wednesday, April 12, 1989.

Rock-a-thon to Benefit AIDS

The Youth Services of the American Red Cross is sponsoring a Rock-a-thon in Independence Mall on Saturday, April 8th from 10am to raise funds for AIDS.

Students from New Hanover, Pender and Brunswick Counties will collect pledges for every hour they rock in a rocking chair. Prizes will be given to the individual and group who rock the longest, who gets the most pledges, and other categories as well.

The money will go towards the Person With AIDS (PWA) Emergency Fund. The PWA helps local AIDS patients in the Southern Southeastern Counties.

Please join us in making a difference in our community. For more information call the American Red Cross at 762-2683.

Rec. Field Supervisors Needed

The Office of Residence Life, seeks applicants for Recreation Field Supervisors. Responsibilities include general supervision of the Residence Life Recreation Field and recreational program planning. Position begins Fall semester 1989. Interviews will be conducted April 17th-21st. We encourage qualified, on-campus students to apply. Contact Jim Anderson at the Office of residence Life at 395-3241.

Participate in Operation Reincarnation

Please remember to put your aluminum cans in the little green and yellow boxes by the garbage cans in the hallways. For more info. call Paul Knox at 256-8274

PRACS Presents Bruce, Elects Officers

"Psychology and AIDS" with Dr. Kate Bruce, sponsored by PRACS will be held in UU lobby at 6:30 pm. on Sunday April 9th. Everyone welcome.

PRACS will meet Thursday, April 6th in UU 207 12-1pm. Everyone invited. Officers for next semester will be elected.

Astrology Lecture Tuesday

"Astrology: Science or Pseudoscience" will be the topic of the next lecture in the Science and Society Series at UNCW this spring.

Dr. Arthur R. Uppgren, professor of astronomy and director of the Van Vleck Observatory at Wesleyan University, Middletown, CT, will speak at 8 p.m., Tuesday April 11, in Bryan Auditorium of Morton Hall. The lecture is free and open to the public.

Sponsors of the program include the American Astronomical Society through its Harlow Shapley visiting Lectureships in Astronomy Program and the UNCW physics department. For more information, contact Dr. Moorad Alexanian 395-3463.

Attention Student Loan Borrowers!

Borrower conferences will be held on campus for student loan borrowers. Conferences will clarify loan repayment information, including rights and responsibilities. Required paperwork will also be available and can be completed at these conferences. Three general workshops designed for large group setting will be held as follows:

Wednesday, April 12th in Cameron Auditorium
9:00 a.m.
10:00 a.m.
11:00 a.m.

"This weekend there is going to be a radical throwdown with music and entertainment [at UNCW]," said Brenda Boyle, co-director of Awareness Festival '89 and president of Campus Awareness Organization(CAO).

The "throwdown" is a product of CAO and the Association for Campus Entertainment(ACE) in an attempt to provide a variety of entertainment for students and provoke their interest in civil, environmental, and animal rights.

Although a previous festival planned by Boyle, a senior Social Science major had to be cancelled because of rain, Boyle said she knew this one would come to be. "In the back of my mind I knew that I had to finish it...because it's worthwhile and it doesn't stem from a selfish need."

When members of CAO became worried that this festival might be cancelled from lack of funds, CAO made unsuccessful pleas to the administration for extra funding.

ACE then decided to contribute their efforts.

According to Jeff Hinkle, co-founder of CAO, "ACE showed interest in co-sponsoring the festival after their concert plans were abruptly halted."

"CAO was running short on funds and because our concert plans fell through, I sort of bailed them out," said John Freer, Concert Chair-person for ACE.

Freer admitted being particularly satisfied at the fact that two rap bands are signed to perform. He also recognized CAO's dedication to the project.

Boyle, Hinkle, and Denny Best, members of CAO have been diligently planning this event, the first of its kind at UNCW.

The three students came up with the idea of holding the festival while discussing the predominant attitude of apathy at UNCW. They hope, however, that the festival will encourage student involvement and interest.

"A lot of students are looking for a reason to get involved - they are looking for a way to channel their energies in a positive way. This festival is their opportunity to do that," said Hinkle, junior Environmental Science major.

With prompting from CAO, many student organizations have decided to participate in the festival by sharing their concerns, goals, and philosophies with those attending.

Those groups participating are: Black Student Union(BSU), Alpha Phi Omega(APO), Students Against Driving Drunk (SADD), North Carolina Student Legislature (NCSL), The National Association for the Advancement of Colored Persons (NAACP), Gay/Lesbian Association, LivWell/ Alternatives, and Campus Crusade for Christ (CCC).

"I think that persons need to be aware of things going on environmentally, politically, and culturally," said Delthea Simmons, president of BSU.

According to Simmons, her group decided to participate because, "A lot of problems come up between races and different classes of people because most persons are woefully ignorant of other groups and cultures, and the way they see things."

Besides the students organizations, many local, state, and national groups will also be present at Awareness Festival '89.

Sigma Chi Epsilon Tries New Approach

BY RICK HEYMANN
STAFF WRITER

Because of dissatisfaction with the predominance of all white or all black sororities, several UNCW students agreed upon the formation of a new specifically interracial sorority.

With the welcomed addition of the Sigma Chi Epsilon sorority, hopes for setting a new trend are high because of the unique philosophy the members share concerning the structure and purpose of their organization.

President, and Castillo shared.

"We are roommates who soon became good friends," said Castillo. When Sorrell, a caucasian and Castillo, a black, looked around campus for a sorority to join, they were disappointed with what they had to offer.

Castillo added, "At first we looked at other sororities without the intention to start one ourselves, but Heather and I agreed that they did not offer what we were looking for."

"Furthermore, after thinking about what sisterhood was all about, we decided that true sisterhood knew no racial boundaries. so we

"It is our purpose that makes us unique on campus. I believe that cultural diversity will be a major asset for our growth. I want everyone [in the sorority] to be able to draw off each other's cultural differences."

According to the organizations' purpose as written on their registration form, the sorority will "promote cross-cultural interaction, the pursuit of knowledge, involvement in the UNCW community, and the building of character through friendship and diverse sisterhood."

The President of the new sorority, Frances Castillo, feels that healthy integration will pave the way to breaking down cultural barriers so that both blacks and whites can prosper.

Castillo stated, "It is our purpose that makes us unique on campus. I believe that cultural diversity will be a major asset for our growth. I want everyone [in the sorority] to be able to draw off each other's cultural differences."

The sorority found its beginning in the relationship that Heather Sorrell, Vice-started our own with the intention to integrate right from the beginning. In this way, no one would be intimidated to pledge regardless of whether they were black or white," she said.

Since the Student Organization Committee's approval of its constitution on March 13, the 22 member sorority is looking forward to prosperity with the blessings and moral support of the administration.

Linda Moore, Greek Advisor, believes that the new sorority will add a new dimension to black-white relations.

"It is an idea whose time has come. I think it will add a lot to the Greek system in terms of race relations, just as the Greek President's council has significantly contributed [to race relations]," said Moore.

Apartheid March Staged By Students

BY PATRICE BRAZZELL
STAFF WRITER

Approximately fourteen students, and a few staff members marched on campus Friday "to give a visual demonstration of exactly what black people are going through in South Africa" according to Delthea Simmons, president of the Black Student Union.

Simmons explained that blacks in South Africa are not allowed to protest the injustices of apartheid, and therefore, use funeral marches as political protests. During these, mourners are often shot and killed.

In the march that began in the Hanover Gym parking lot, a small coffin was carried and two girls portraying mourners walked ahead of the group. Others portrayed the Afrikaner police, who break up the protests in South Africa, with guns.

The march was part of a concept by Simmons and senior Chris Meredith, member of the BSU, for a "Heritage Holiday."

"Heritage Holiday," which occurred this weekend, included cultural exhibits in the Union, a pageant, the annual ceremonial ball, and a Sunday morning service.

The idea for this event came about, according to Meredith, when students expressed a desire for a social event similar to those on other historically black campuses (such as "Aggie Fest" at North Carolina A&T) that reflect their cultural heritage. Meredith stressed that this event was also educational.

Meredith hopes that the march will "make the university and outer community aware of the cruelties experienced by South Africans, and make an impact on students."

The march ended in front of the Union, with a re-enactment of mourners getting shot and wounded by Afrikaner police. Dr. Matthew Kambule, professor in the UNCW Department of Mathematical Science, and native South African, then gave a short speech on his experiences in South Africa.

Kambule was pleased with the demonstration.

He said, "Anything to raise awareness of apartheid is educational."

In his speech Kambule expressed the horrors of apartheid, especially those experienced by the youth of South Africa. He determined that these type of demonstrations are positive, raising student consciousness so that it will make them "definitely want to know more about what's happening in South Africa."

"These groups aren't seeking donations; rather, they are trying to elicit membership and interest in their group," said Boyle, senior Social Science major.

Not only will the festival be a tremendous learning experience for those in attendance, but it will also give people a chance to appreciate a variety of entertainment. This entertainment will include speakers, poetry readers, and bands. (Please see the accompanying list for the names of these participants.) Realizing that food and t-shirts are often a main attraction for college students, the members of CAO have contacted a number of local vendors of handcrafted goods and homemade foods to set up booths. The displays will range from vendors selling vegetarian subs and t-shirts to yoga demonstrations and a massage.

CAO wished to credit Pepsi, Roses Coal and Ice, and Mill Outlet Village as being the sponsoring merchants.

"It's obvious that CAO has put a great deal of time and effort into the planning of Awareness Festival '89 and I'm glad I could be a part of it," said Freer.

Boyle and Hinkle agree that their hard work will be pay off if students attending the festival are able to gain a deeper awareness of the many issues affecting them.

"CAO is an organization of activists banded together to raise the awareness of the student population," said Best, co-founder of CAO.

Awareness Festival '89 Participants

"The local, state, and national organizations that will be present at the festival are The Cape Fear Literacy Council, Families in Crisis, The Big Buddy Program, Greenpeace, Amnesty International, World Watch Institute, The Vegetarian Society, NC Network for Animals, START, The Banaili Faith, Peace Corp, Operation Recreation, Food Distribution Center, Sierra Club, Peaceworks, American Red Cross, Community Wellness Center, the Domestic Violence Shelters, and Hospice.

"Those persons who will be speaking on a variety of issues are as follows: Dr. Sheridan, Racism; Bob Haywood, Youth Responsibility; Leo Teachout, Homophobia; Dr. Kambule, South Africa; Dr. Metzger, Environmental Issues; Craig Martin, START; Dr. Rob Miller, Nicaragua; Elijah Lockie, Indian Rights; and Jim McGivern, Freedom of Speech.

"Poetry Readers will be Mark Meachum, Brian Owenby, Jean Jones, and Alan Johnson.

"The following bands will perform at the festival: Mary Davis, folk; Marshmellow Steamshovel, progressive; White Bikes, psychedelic progressive; Brick Bat, progressive; Dischord, progressive; Southern Culture on the Skids, rockabilly progressive; The Hey Days, psychedelic; The Outlaw and NC Tee, rap; Wooden Trains, folk rock; The Blues Society, blues; No reason to Hate, progressive; and United Lyricsists, rap.

Fales Presents "Wilmington Yesteryear"

"Wilmington Yesteryear" will be the topic of an illustrated lecture by noted Wilmington historian Robert M. Fales, M.D., at 7:30 p.m., Tuesday, April 11, in Randall Library Auditorium on the campus of UNC Wilmington. The program, which is free and open to the public, is sponsored by the Public Programs Committee of the UNCW history department.

During his talk, Fales will show a collection of his slides depicting bygone scenes from Wilmington from the late 19th and 20th centuries. Program planners explained that this will be a fitting introduction to Wilmington's 250th anniversary celebration to begin this summer.

For additional information, contact Walter Allen, associate professor of history, at 395-3315.

Phi Kappa Phi Inducts New Members

On Thursday, April 13, 1989 at 4:00 p.m. the honor society Phi Kappa Phi will hold its annual induction ceremony in Bryan Auditorium of Morton Hall.

On this occasion, students of outstanding academic records in all academic disciplines and one notable faculty member will be inducted.

The guest speaker will be Dr. Eric Bolen, Dean of the Graduate School and Professor of Biological Sciences. Dr. Bolen, who came to UNCW in August 1988 from Texas Tech, received his B.S. from the University of Maine and his Ph.D. from Utah State University. A specialist in wildlife ecology and environmental history, Bolen has published over 150 papers and co-authored a text which is now in its second edition.

Dr. Bolen's address is entitled "Golden Arches and the Irvied Cathedral." The public is invited to attend.

History Dept. Presents Victorian Show

Dr. Michael Laine, associate professor of English at Victoria College, University of Toronto, will present a slide lecture on "Victorian Book Illustration: Victorian Authors and Their Illustrators," at 8 p.m., Wednesday, April 12, in Bryan Auditorium, Morton Hall.

Sponsored by the history department, the lecture is free and open to the public. For more information, contact Dr. Bruce Kinzer, 395-3312.

The regular quarterly meeting of the Board of trustees will be held Wednesday, April 12, at 12:30 p.m. in the Hawk's Nest. The following committee meetings will be held prior to the 12:30 fullboard meeting: Student Affairs Committee will meet at 9 a.m. in UU-201; Academic Affairs Committee at 11 a.m. in AL-215 and Business Affairs Committee at 9:30 a.m. in AL-211.

Nominate Your Advisor!

The deadline for student organizations, faculty, or staff members to nominate a student organization advisor for the Student Organization Advisor Award is 5:00 pm on April 12, 1989. Forms are available in the Student Activities Office, room 202 of the University Union. The Award will be presented to this outstanding advisor at the Leadership Banquet scheduled for April 23, 1989.

Seniors Present Piano Recitals

Lisa Harrison and Jennifer Stallings, senior music students at UNCW will present a joint piano recital at 8 p.m., Tuesday, April 11 in Kenan Auditorium.

Sex Survey A Fraud At UA

(CPS) - Someone is passing himself off as a University of Arizona sociology student conducting a sexuality survey by phone, and then asking the female UA students and alumni he contacts obscene questions.

"There have been numerous phone calls to us relaying this problem, asking if we have a student conducting a survey," said Sherry Enderle, a sociology department administrator. "The sociology department would not condone such questions."

Enderle estimates the department fielded at least 10 calls from women complaining about the fraudulent survey in recent months. "It seems to really take off at the beginning of the semester," she said.

One student said a man called her in October asking for help with his sociology research project. She said he asked a series of innocent questions that quickly turned intrusive and obscene. In January, he called again, offering $20 an hour for her participation.

"He'll ask you a reasonable question, then trick you" into answering lascivious questions, she said.

After police told the woman they couldn't trace calls to her home until she received 30 to 40 prank calls, she changed her telephone number.

Assistant Chief Harry Hueston of the UA police department said obscene phone call crimes are not easy to solve because there is rarely a suspect and no way to trace the call once the victim hangs up.

The National Black MBA Association Announces Additional Scholarships

The National Black MBA Association (NBMBAA) has announced the addition of three $3,000 graduate school scholarships; as part of its 1989 Scholarship Awards Program.

The recent increase in scholarship awards now brings to nine the total number of awards available to minority graduate students in a business administration or management program. Recipients of this year's scholarships join the ranks of many ambitious black students around the country who are recognized for their commitment to higher education and professional development.

To qualify for this year's available scholarships, applicants have been requested to submit an essay detailing strategic methods for a corporation to increase the pool of qualified minority candidates by focusing on the interdependence between business and educational institutions. For more information contact: Larry Fleischman (312) 644-6610 or Donna Holmes (312) 236-2622.

Azalea Festival Offers Student Style Entertainment

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

Each spring the city of Wilmington eagerly awaits the arrival of the annual Azalea Festival. This year's festival, April 13-16, will offer a wide variety of entertainment opportunities of interest to UNCW students (many events are either free or inexpensive).

Saturday's parade (9 a.m.) can be called the highlight of the Azalea Festival. After the parade will be the annual Street Fair offering arts, crafts, food and entertainment ranging from bands to cloggers. The Street Fair will continue on Sunday and is free.

Eve Corneliuss and Chip Crawford, The Spragues, Steve Logan, Loren Raynor, Laura McLean and Shannon Wyatt are among the musicians performing for the Street Fair. The musical styles represented include blues, jazz, gospel and dixieland.

On Sunday, April 9 the famous Thunderbirds will be performing. Admission to the airshow is $3.

The Variety Show at Legion Stadium Friday, April 14 at 6:30 p.m. is free. Also free will be the Volleyball tournament at Crystal Pier from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and the Amateur Boxing Exhibition at 3 p.m. at Williston Jr. High School on Saturday.

Saturday and Sunday two US Navy hydrofoil ships and two Coast Guard cutters will be open for tours at Waterfront Park.

The Clyde Beatty-Cole Brothers Circus will give three shows: Friday at 2 p.m., Saturday at 3 p.m., and Sunday at 2 p.m. General Admission is $8.

In concert for this year's festival will be Hall and Oates. The pop music duo are set to perform Thursday, April 13 at 8 p.m. in Trask Coliseum. The reserved seating tickets are $20.

The Queen's Coronation Pageant Saturday, April 15 boasts a performance by Frankie Valli & The Four Seasons. Tickets for this event are also $20.

(Press Release) One of the highlights of Wilmington's 1989 Azalea Festival will be two special presentations of the USS NORTH CAROLINA Battleship Memorial's famed Sound and Light Spectacular, "The Immortal Showboat." This 70-minute drama which tells the battleship's history through voice, music, sound effects and lights will be presented on Friday and Saturday nights, April 14 and 15, at 9:00 p.m.

"The Immortal Showboat's" story begins with her construction at New York Navy Yard in 1937 and continues through her participation in all 12 major naval campaigns in the Pacific Ocean during World War II.

The principal characters in this outdoor drama are two sailors from North Carolina and one from Texas. Through the voices of Walter Abel, Alexander Scourby, 18 actors and such world leaders as President Franklin D. Roosevelt, President Harry S. Truman, Winston Churchill and Adolf Hitler, realism is brought to this exciting presentation.

Spectators sit in a 1,000-seat grandstand just across from the ship's port bow. During the show, over 400 lights of varying color and intensity create the USS NORTH CAROLINA's many moods.

Special effects include light 20mm and 40mm antiaircraft gun-fire; the blast and flame of large 5-inch and 16-inch guns; and a simulated torpedo explosion.

Admission fees to the Sound and Light Spectacular at $3.00 for adults (age 12 and over) and $1.50 for children (ages 6-11). Admission fees to the Battleship Memorial are $4.00 for adults (age 12 and over) and $2.00 for children (ages 6-11).

The following schedule will be in effect at the THE USS NORTH CAROLINA Battleship Memorial during the 1989 Azalea Festival: On Thursday, April 13 to Sunday, April 16, the ship opens at 8:00 a.m. and closes at 8:00 p.m., on April 14 and 15, the ship opens at 8:00 a.m. and closes at 8:00 p.m. and the Sound and Light show starts at 9:00 p.m.

(Press Release) Enjoy a colorful and nostalgic trip down Memory Lane on Saturday, April 15, 1989, when New Hanover County Museum of the Lower Cape Fear will show two vintage Azalea Festival films. These films will be presented at 10:00 a.m., 11:00 a.m., Noon, 1:00 p.m., and 2:00 p.m.

"A Million Azaleas" shows the first, 1948, festival. This 15 minute color film is narrated by Ted Malone who brought his national radio show to Wilmington for the event. Other first-festival highlights captured on the film include Azalea Queen Jacqueline White, the original Azalea Festival Parade, and Mutual Broadcasting's "Queen for a Day."

"A Festival of Azaleas," a 14 minute color film, covers the 6th festival which was held in 1953. The film shows how the festival had evolved and includes footages of the PGA Golf Tournament, a rodeo, a craft show, and harness racing as well as the traditional parade.

MOVIE REVIEW

BY ALLEN RAY
STAFF CRITIC

Fletch Lives—Two and 1/2 stars—If you are a big Fletch chase fan, and loved the original Fletch, you probably still won't like Fletch Lives. I had high hopes for this sequel based on the character of investigative reporter Irwin Fletcher played by Chevy Chase.

In this sequel, Fletch inherits a distant aunt's run-down southern plantation and upon arriving, gets involved in a hard scandal with a Southern Televangelist, a murder, and illegal toxic dumping. Sound far-fetched? It is!

Where as the first Fletch was fast, believable, and had a sharp sarcastic wit to it, this film is slow, flat, and the humor is often off the mark. This film has some good moments (Fletch singing the Song of the South: Zippidy-Do-Do-Do), but not enough to fill two hours.

Leviathan—Three and 1/2 stars—in this action packed underwater adventure, Peter Weller plays a geologist who is in charge of an underwater mining operation 16,000 ft. under the surface of the ocean.

This movie for all intents and purposes is part Aliens and part Poseidon Adventure, but with a dead crew. Would you go in and look? I wouldn't. But of course they do.

This film is fast-paced, well-acted, suspenseful and even has a sense of humor. One of the better movies out, go see it!

Step-N-2 will have an album release party Friday at 10 p.m. in Rm. 100. Tapes, CD's, records and posters will be given away. Free.

Join the fun!

Gloria Steinem Will Be Featured

Gloria Steinem, writer and editorial consultant for Ms. Magazine, will be the featured speaker at a conference hosted by Southeastern Community College Friday, May 5 from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m.

The one-day conference, entitled "Empowering Rural Women" is being held to educate and increase the awareness of professionals who work with rural women in southeastern North Carolina.

Southeastern, Cape Fear, Fayetteville Technical, Sampson, Richmond and Robeson Community Colleges are the sponsors of the conference. The conference is partially funded by the grant from the N.C.

Humanities Council

A national spokeswoman on issues of equality, as well as a critically acclaimed writer, editor and lecturer, Gloria Steinem co-founded Ms. Magazine in 1972. Ms. Magazine, a national feminist magazine, is published monthly. In addition, Steinem is an organizer and board member of "Ms. Foundation for Women."

Steinem's writings include Maiden: Norma Jean, and works in Outrageous Acts and Everyday Rebellions. She is currently writing The Bedside Book of Self-Esteem which is to be published later this year.

Steinem has traveled widely as a guest lecturer and interviewer, and she continues to write columns for several magazines.

In addition to Steinem, the conference will have other known speakers on women's issues such as Dr. Mary Jo Bratton and Dr. Marie Farr from East Carolina University, Dr. Linda Flowers from N.C. Wesleyan College; and Dr. Janice Kennedy-Sloan from the N.C. Department of Community Colleges.

The cost for the conference is $5 which includes registration fee and lunch. There will be no on-site registration and participation will be limited to the first 300 people.

Interested persons should send the registration fee of $5 to the following: Helen Hilton, Southeastern Community College, P.O. Box 151, Whiteville, NC. 28472. Make checks payable to Southeastern Community College and mark for Gloria Steinem Conference.

The deadline for receiving registrations is May 1, 1989. Persons needing more information can call Helen Hilton, Southeastern Community College; Joyce Beatty, Robeson Community College; Billie Crawford, Sampson Community College; Mary B. Rea-Potter, Cape Fear Community College; Helen Winstead, Fayetteville Technical Community College; or Cynthia Magee, Richmond Community College.

Civic Ballet Performs Bunny Ballet

(Press Release) Peter Rabbit and Friends, a ballet based on Beatrix Potter's charming stories, will be presented by the Wilmington Civic Ballet on Saturday, April 20 at 8 p.m. and on Sunday, April 30 at 3 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium.

Tickets are available at the Thalian Hall Center Box Office, 118 Princess Street (763-3398) and are $7.00 for adults and $3.00 for students. Tickets also will be available at the door prior to the performances, and will be $8.00 for adults and $4.00 for students.

Sweet Potatoes: How Sweet (and Good) They Are!

Can something that tastes so good be that good for you? When it comes to sweet potatoes, the answer is yes!

Sweet potatoes are free of fat and cholesterol and very low in sodium. They're also high in vitamins A and C—nutrients which the federal government's National Cancer Institute says may help to reduce risks of certain types of cancer. They also provide vitamin B6, iron, potassium and fiber, and a medium sweet potato has just 114 calories. So there's lots of healthful reasons to include them this holiday season, as well as throughout the year.

They're great piping hot from the microwave. A medium sweet potato cooks in about 4 to 6 minutes. Drizzle cooked sweet potatoes with a little maple syrup and top with pecans or scoop out the flesh and mash with orange juice or combine with diced pineapple, coconut or sautéed mushrooms.

Try sweet potatoes shredded and sautéed with raisins, or serve them sliced and lightly glazed with honey.

The North Carolina Yam Commission suggests you look for firm, copper-colored sweet potatoes with blemish-free skins. They should be well-shaped and tapered at both ends. Keep them in a cool, dry, well-ventilated place. Sweet potatoes should never be refrigerated until after cooking.

Think of sweet potatoes for holiday dining. But remember them, too, throughout the year for healthful eating for your appetizers, entrees, side dishes, salads and desserts. ♫

Orange Glazed Sweet Potatoes

- 3 medium-sized sweet potatoes
- 2 tablespoons margarine or butter
- 3 tablespoons honey
- Grated peel from 1 orange
- 2 tablespoons fresh orange juice

Pare sweet potatoes and slice thinly. Melt margarine in a large skillet. Add sweet potatoes; cover and cook over medium heat about 10 minutes or until tender, turning often. Combine honey, orange peel and juice; pour over sweet potatoes and toss until sweet potatoes are thoroughly glazed. Makes 4 servings. ♫

Wanted: Student Input On School

Before I graduate, I want to see if anything I say can elicit a response from the students.

I have undertaken the task of finding out what students are really feeling out there. I'd like to find out how they feel about the food service here, how they feel about parking, the SGA, the Seahawk (that's the paper, not the mascot) and find out if they have anything to say about school in general.

To do this takes more initiative than I might have exhibited in the past by sitting upstairs in the Union and waiting for some student to take the time to type a letter to the editor and actually send it.

We started by simply asking people about the aforementioned subjects to see if we were abnormal because we cared.

What we (at the Seahawk) found out was that it wasn't that students didn't care, it was they didn't want to or didn't have the time to speak out on things. There was a "sloth" factor here as well which brought about such answers as, "I did write a letter, but I never got around to sending it," and "I can't really do anything about it (aspects of campus life) so why should I try."

This campus revolves around students. If you don't like something say something, don't be afraid. If you have some ideas on how to make this a better place put it on paper and send it to us or go to the SGA meetings on Monday night at 6:00 p.m. and say something. They have time set aside for students, faculty and staff to speak and it can make a difference.

This Friday, Monday and Tuesday we will have a suggestion box set up downstairs in the Union. If you want to write a letter to the editor or have a comment, complaint or suggestion just pick up a piece of paper write out what you have to say, sign it and drop it in the box.

Next week we'll print as many letters as we can.

Personally, as far as the paper is concerned, I was really surprised at the number of comments about our April Fool's issue. It's nice to hear them, good or bad (at least we know someone reads it), but it would be much nicer to have received something written. We have no way of judging what students want more of or less of in "their" paper.

The newspaper is not a guaranteed part of UNCW.

There are two ways in which we receive money, one being advertising which this year happens to account for about $20,000 of our budget comes from advertising, the remaining $22,500 comes from your pockets via student fees.

Currently there are positions open for students in WLOZ (campus radio), the fledgling (annual staff), Atlantis (UNCW's only literary magazine) and the Seahawk. Some positions carry salaries, some carry scholarships and some just look good on your record. Financial potential aside, all of these positions allow you to do something instead of sit around and wait to graduate. Resumes look better with extra-curriculars and experience, and good references both of which you can get through any of these medias.

Don't be afraid to get respond in the suggestion box, or to get involved; how can the school get better if the students don't care?

Editorials

Reincarnation a better idea than you think

It is surprising and dismayed that no matter how easy someone makes conservation or awareness of environment for man, he doesn't pay attention.

If you'd noticed the little green and yellow boxes in the halls near most major garbage cans, and decidedly ignored them, you are rendering fruitless the hard work of Paul Knox, a UNCW student who cares very much about recycling (yes, that's part of conservation). Knox has made those little boxes for us to dump our aluminum cans in, so he can take them to be remelted and reformed.

The Campus Awareness Organization has planned a festival for both the entertainment and intellectual stimulation of the students. Don't be a whiner and complain about UNCW not offering enough to do; go to the Awareness Festival '89 and appreciate the hard work of students who do care very much that you broaden your mind and learn to refrain from throwing trash from your car.

Maybe then all the campus and city organizations who support the adopt a highway program wouldn't have so much to do on the Saturday mornings they dedicate to making our local highways junk-free.

Don't grow up to be the kind of negligent jerk who drinks while driving a tanker holding 200 million gallons of crude oil capable of killing uncountable numbers of sea animals. Or an avaricious developer who tries to get by the new ruling which allows the Army Corps of Engineers to observe the construction around wetlands to make such digging or draining is not going on.

Try to recognize that it's not our right or prerogative to come even as close to eliminating the manatee as we have. This is a creature which has been on earth some nine million years, and in the 7 decades since the invention of the outboard motor, we've killed all but 1200 of them.

Let it bother you that although YOU didn't kill those manatees, or throw out all that garbage onto the roads, or drain those wetlands that might have harbored other endangered species, that your children might only know a manatee, a clean stretch of grass, or a wetlands heron from a picture or from your memories which might fade in time too.

About the April Fools Issue...

To anyone who was upset over the April Fools pages in the last issue of the Seahawk: We regret upsetting anyone who can't take a joke.

We understand that while many people enjoyed it, and especially fooling their friends with it, some who believed in it most heartily in the beginning were upset to find it wasn't. (This pertains especially to the article on records being lost, and the article on JR Reid.)

The amount of ill will seems directly related to the length of time the person believed the article to be true before being told it was false.

It would have been nice if we could have called all involved (or implicated, as the case may be) in the stories we ran, but somehow the issue would have lost its impact.

Thanks to all of the compliments, we're glad you had as much fun with it as we did, and we hope all the sore April Fools forgive us soon.

A Deep Hunger For Inner Space

I would like to invite you again to consider what it is on which you ground your life. It is a big question. It is an important question. It is one easily lost sight of in all of the demands that are placed on our life and the issues that claim our attention day by day and moment by moment.

I have certainly lost sight of this question for a while. This has been a hard semester for me for a variety of reasons mostly related to the stress of getting a house built. Now that it is over, I am beginning to sit back and reflect, with some amazement, about how easily and quickly I gave up on my connection with the deeper values of my life to the stress of daily decisions and schedules which were being complicated by the house. Once more I learned, the hard way, how easy it is to think and talk about important values and how difficult it is to live them out.

But I am back now. I am reclaiming my varieties of connections to the deep core of my own being which is the center of all that I value. For me that center is God. It is a state of inner being that gives clarity to my questions about what is important, how I want to spend my life and what is an unfeeling source of security.

In my weeks when I let my stress take me away from that center, I was still comforted by the fact that I felt a deep hunger for that inner space. At least I knew I was away from "home" and yearned to get back.

Many people have never found that inner core of identity on which to ground their life. I imagine your life is full of activities or full of questions or both. I hope that for you there is place way down deep, a state of being that provides for you solid ground on which to "stand." If not, I would wish for you a longing, a hunger that will set you forth on a journey for that particular kind of Holy Ground.

Many people live their lives without ever discovering such a center. They take their clues for what is important from their social environment. My witness to you is that to seek a ground for your being it is to set forth on a journey that will lead you to a clearer sense of who you are, what you are really about and what is truly and deeply important amidst all the varying claims of what should be important for you. And to find that ground is to find ourselves a state of peace and freedom that nothing else that I know of can bring.

The "Subtle" Differences Of Gender

As we all know, or should know, there are differences between the sexes. Besides the obvious physical differences, for which I'm quite thankful, several "subtle" differences also exist. Some of these differences may not have occurred to you.

I'm not saying which gender is better or smarter, mind you. It's that many people feel that males and females are alike in their thinking. Well, that's a bunch of bull. I have witnessed many differentiations between the genders. This is generally speaking; not all persons apply. (I hope that's enough to keep the females who think that I'm a sexist pig off my back.)

One of the most obvious differences is that females have the "Three Stooges" and males love them. Guys will cackle like hyenas while watching Moput a saw to Curly's skull while kicking him in the butt repeatedly. Females will say, "They are so stupid." Remember they're not called "The Three Geniuses."

"Shelf paper" is another distinction between the sexes. Females will line their cabinets with paper when they move into a new place. Males won't even unpack.

We all know how long it takes many females to prepare their faces, just so they can be seen in public. Many take hours to get "the right look."

Males, on the other hand, may shower and dress—that's all; they're out of there. They don't care how frightful they may look.

When males are thirsty, what do they do? They simply go to the refrigerator and take a few swigs out of a bottle of anything and put it back in. I've never witnessed a female doing this. They actually get a glass from the cupboard, open the bottle, pour some into the glass, return it to the fridge and then drink it. Drinking out of the bottle is "gross" to a female, but "cool" to a male.

When it comes to shopping, females treat it as a sport. Sometimes it's even a team sport. They choose their team and head for the mall—prepared to thrash anyone or thing in their way. But shopping for a male consists of running in a convenient store for beer and chips. Females also will count out pennies and appear wealthier. Males will slap down a twenty for a purchase of $2.02. They figure that's the store's problem.

Some say it's a fallacy that males are more, ah, shall I say "amorous" than females, but I don't think so. Males can get amorous simply by viewing a Pepsi commercial. Hell, they can get amorous by viewing a trash can. Females, on the other hand, need a little more than a commercial to get their juices flowing. They at least need a raunchy video on MTV. That same video can cause a male to start eyeing his cat a little differently.

Soaps operas have for many years separated the genders also. Females watch them with keen interest and discuss them with their friends. They almost believe that "Brad really got Chanel pregnant even though he's engaged to Trudy (He watches too many Pepsi commercials) who just had an abortion because Brad threatened to kill her if she had the baby. It's really weird because Chanel used to be gay."

Males just scoff at that stuff and say, "It ain't real." But a bunch of tall men putting a round object in a hoop is real, and exciting. It's enough to cause them to scream at the TV and get drunk over—and that's when their team wins! If their team loses, they don't give their cats the "eye"—they kick the hell out of them. Females say, "Who cares about a bunch of grown men running and throwing a stupid ball around?"

Manners and neatness definitely divide the sexes. You've seen a male eat chips. He will stuff an entire fistful into his gaping mouth and allow the smaller crumbs to trickle between his lips onto the floor. Females will eat one chip at a time. They're in trouble though, when the bag is full of crumbs. They must put those into their mouth like private.

Language may be the ultimate difference between the genders. Females talk more flowery; they say things like "lovely, restroom, ambience, and shelf paper." But, "bite me, shake my weasel, I got your (fill in the blank) hanging, and she wants me," are common terms among the male population.

We are all aware that females hate spiders and bugs with a passion. Many females are not aware that males hate them too. They even think that males kind of enjoy killing gross slimy creatures. In reality, males worry and shake slightly as they go after a spider with a rolled-up magazine. They are afraid that they may only "wing" the creature and it will land on their (aasagh) arm. When a spider is in a room with a male and there is no female present—their attitude is "live and let live."

By the way, have you ever witnessed a female scratching her crotch area? Me neither. Men do it on national television.

We're fortunate to have these differences. If the sexes were alike, who would paper the cabinets? Who would cook when the ballgame was on? Who would kill spiders and cock-roaches? It would be and even more confused world to live in.

Hey, I got your Seahawk hanging.

Freedom Of Speech: A Western Ideal

BY MICHAEL NOVAK
AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE

(COLLEGIATE TIMES) Salman Rushdie, that hypocritical anti-Westerner and trendy leftist, has taught us number of important lessons. The controversy over his book, The Satanic Verses, has also illustrated, with great clarity, what is at stake in the debate over Western Civilization courses at many leading universities.

Now we know that our literary establishment believes in absolutes. At least in one absolute. Socialist journalist Christopher Hitchens intones the Western creed: "the absolute right of free expression and free inquiry." If not absolute, self-evident this truth may be to us and to our literary establishment. It appears not to be self-evident to the Ayatollah Khomeini. Or to millions of Moslems.

Most places on earth, in fact, do not believe in the absolute right of free expression and free inquiry. In historical perspective, the idea is a relatively new one. The Ayatollah is quite right: it is a Western idea.

And so, maybe the work does need the West, after all. Certainly Mr. Rushdie does and so do other writers and thinkers.

Which makes it so odd that so many writers and professors have for years preferred Third Worldism to the West. One writer called the white race "the cancer of the human race." Others say the West should not "impose" its values on the Third World.

But now, thanks to Mr. Rushdie, Western writers do want to impose their values on the Third World. Western culture is a tiny minority in a sea of culture with shockingly different values. If we insist our values are superior, we must offer good reasons.

Does the Ayatollah understand why there is a right to free expression and free inquiry? Does he know how such rights came to recognition and were institutionally secured? To understand, one has to read the Western books (from Milton, Locke, Mill and Madison to Vatican II) that argued for, defined and explained those rights, and know the histories of the long and arduous struggles that have secured them in so few places on earth.

This presents a problem. Since many of our universities are not even imposing these Western classics on their own students, it may seem odd to want impose them on grown men and women not of the West.

But Salman Rushdie may have changed this. After building a high reputation in London by excoriating the West in book after book, Mr. Rushdie has shown us why the universities should require all students to study more carefully the classic books of the West.

conducted uncritically, without attention to particular values (and to the classic arguments that vindicate them), it is only babytalk.

Some differences are worth fighting for. Free inquiry is one such. Free expression is another. World War II was fought to prevent a thousand-year Reich from banishing both. The long, gray war against communism has had a spirit of respect. And that is the final lesson that Salman Rushdie teaches us. Yes, he had a right to free expression and free inquiry—at least, among us he had that right. But for causing pain and embarrassment to millions of his fellow Moslems, for the outrage of mocking (even in a literary dream) the founder of their religion, he does not win our respect.

He is free to write what he believes. But we are also free to withhold from him our respect. Free expression invites freely given disappointment. Protect him, yes; respect for what he wrote, no.

Not all of us in the West are secular. Indeed, in America, most of us are religious—and respectful of other religions besides our own.

Michael Novak, a nationally syndicated columnist, holds the George Frederick Jewett chair at the American Enterprise Institute. His newest book is Free Persons and the Common Good (Madison Books). DISTRIBUTED BY THE COLLEGIATE NETWORK

And by contrast the literature of Islamic, African, Asian and other cultures.

It is not enough to learn about the precious values that some Westerners forget when speaking of ill of the West. It is necessary to learn why other cultures do not share these values.

Salman Rushdie has taught us that, on some crucial matters, cultures are not equal. On some matters and in certain dimensions, some cultures are better than others. Those that protect free inquiry and free expression are better, for example, on that point, than others.

It is all well and good to talk about "one world," "interdependence," and "cross-cultural interchange." But if all this noble talk is to be similar purpose.

Already many Moslems have expressed shame at the Ayatollah's murderous threats. Powerful reasons exist for respecting free inquiry and free expression and most of the world is coming to realize them. Glasnost itself bows to them.

Here in America, our framers conceived of an experiment in "ordered liberty," a liberty confirmed in law and self-control, and guided by temperance, justice, courage and wisdom. The fantasy that a republic could survive without such virtues, James Madison said, is "chimerical."

The reason we believe in free inquiry and free expression is that the mind by its nature seeks the truth; it can be trusted, even though it often prohibited, but other than that, no power to partially control private business operators is authorized. The US government does have the power to pay its workers (see Employee, 26 USC 3401 (c)) whatever it chooses. Free market pay is essentially a contractual agreement.

The appearance of a country having privately owned businesses along with some subtle governmental control is a practical definition of one of the components of fascism.

"The appearance of a country having privately owned businesses along with some subtle governmental control is a practical definition of one of the components of fascism"

Perhaps an experiment in freedom is necessary. Reduce governmental taxation of businesses, repeal minimum wage statutes, and possibly even set up "free trade" zones/cities/states. See what thrives, and replicate it.

Our country should not be subject to the social fancies and whims of self-serving professional politicians. At has been argued that whatever reason). Last some poor innocent cretin out there thinks minimum wage is akin to socialism and not an element of fascism - go look up the respective definitions!

Next we can scrutinize WHY some politicians want the minimum wage raised. One, it gets them in the press (for free), and two, it appears to be socially acceptable; "the in-thing." When is the last time you remember a Congressman standing up for constitutional principles? It is not done too often because few citizens know our constitution and it is not prone to media-hype.

Lastly, consider the hypothetical situation that could exist if the Senate passes the minimum wage bill. As history can and does repeat itself, look at what union price demands did in our recent past: (1) they definitely did give a boost to union pay, (2) companies are not stupid, and they obviously do not lose profits from pay hikes hence they "pass it down" (a.k.a. "the trickle down effect") to who? YOU, Joe Fudd consumer and I.M. Broke.

Guess that will make people on FIXED EARNINGS upset since prices will rise to offset the rise in wages (=cost/price spiral). Then, as those fixed income grumble more to more they complain to Congress; it becomes popular, and poof - fixed income is raised-right along with you taxes.

No fees you say. Solution. Give true freedom a try!

(1) Get government off the back of business (2) limit all politicians to one term in office and watch how fast our economy would turn around.

WE WANT YOU TO

Dear Editor,

The Albert Schweitzer International Prize Ceremony held in Kenan Auditorium on March 22 was inspiring, to say the least.

UNCW should be very honored to welcome such distinguished humanitarians, and no doubt the college does feel privileged. My concern is that the honor may last for only one night, and is little beyond name recognition for the majority of the students.

As a recent graduate of UNCW, I feel cheated having to had to wait until after my college career to realize the brilliant scholarship and role model qualities possessed by Albert Schweitzer. Why didn't one of my professors explain the depth of the man whose portrait hangs by the stairs of the Union? I regret to reveal that before the other night, it was Albert Einstein!

The man whose presence and memory graces our halls is perhaps and even more important figure because of his humanitarian philosophy of "reverence for life."

If I had known about the doctor and his beliefs during my college career, I may have been able to uphold them during the many conversations in which participated during monthly Human Relations Board meetings. Albert Schweitzer truly bridged the racial dilemma by exceeding it, yet it is a topic UNCW still immaturely and boorishly suffers.

Wake up, Professors! You've got a beacon of light to use as a noble example. Wake up, all concerned with the black/white issue! Recognize the strides others have made and go forward. Wake up, Dr. Schweitzer, and find your way into the 80's attitudes that shape all our lives.

EDITOR'S NOTE: This note was sent to the Dean of Students office dated March 15. Dean Leonard sent it to our office.

Dear Ms. Leonard,
I have just finished reading our Health Director's report of the recent "Outbreak of Measles" in New Hanover County. There have been a number of thank you letters written to UNCW-W Staff and from UNCW-W Staff thanking everyone for their help and support.

I just wanted to take the time to write you on behalf of the UNCW-W students! I was one of the Public Health Nurses involved from beginning to end with the "measles outbreak" and actual student contact. My time was spent counseling the students before they received the measles immunization.

I found them to be polite, co-operative and very interested in what we were trying to do for them. I just want to say thanks to the students at UNCW-W for making my job easy. Perhaps one day our paths will cross and I can tell you their first hand of our experience.

"Hazelwood" To Be Tested: Publisher Threatens To Sue

(CPS) - The former publisher of California State University - Los Angeles student paper said March 24 she would sue the school, claiming she had been fired for running stories that criticized campus President James Rosser.

In what promises to be the first major court test of 1988's landmark "Hazelwood decision," Joan Zydka, fired last April, said she would file suit for damages and to get her job back.

The school fired Zydka after months of squabbling, set off by a 1987 award-winning story in the University Times of the death of a CSULA student in a campus building wrecked by an earthquake.

The dead student's parents, using facts from the University Times' story, filed a $5 million wrongful death suit against the school, claiming the administration was negligent in not quake-proofing the building.

"Pressure on Zydka increased with the lawsuit. They (the administration) accused her of 'negative journalism,' of everything but what was really on their minds," said Barry Fisher, Zydka's lawyer.

Administrators also objected to "editorials and cartoons criticizing CSULA President James Rosser and his aides for impeding the free flow of information," Zydka conjectured.

But CSULA spokeswoman Ruth Goldway said at the time of the firing that administrators were upset that the paper was losing money and dissatisfied with Zydka's performance.

"When I suggested that the university buy ads (to support both the paper and the mission of the university), Rosser declined unless he was given certain controls over the paper's content," Zydka said.

She maintained Rosser wanted to control the paper, if only to minimize CSULA's legal liability for what it published.

In the weeks after the U.S. Supreme Court's January, 1988, "Hazelwood" ruling, which gave high school principals the right to control the editorial content of papers run as for-credit classroom "laboratories," CSULA officials announced they were changing the University Times into a "laboratory newspaper" and demoting Zydka.

Zydka's well-publicized resistance ended with her firing three months later.

"The essence of the suit is the retaliatory firing of Zydka for her stories on the earthquake and the questions about the administration's culpability (in the death of a student)," Fisher said.

CSULA Vice President and General Counsel Mayer Chapman would not comment on the lawsuit because, "We haven't been served. We think there's some manipulation of the media going on. We've gotten 20 calls, but we haven't seen anything."

Goodman Speaks On "A Matter Of Values"

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

Ellen Goodman, Pulitzer Prize winning columnist and Associate Editor for the Boston Globe was the speaker Tuesday, April 4 at UNCW's eighth annual celebration of National Women's History Month.

Goodman's writing, which is often from the feminist perspective, has attracted much recognition, including the recent May 1988 Hubert Humphrey Civil Rights Award for her dedication to the cause of equality.

Ellen Goodman described herself as "an observer of change in our present society." Goodman's columns tend to concern our country's values pertaining to women.

"I observe the changes in public and private relationships and the women's movement from one life pattern to the next," said Goodman.

"A Matter of Values was the topic of her talk which was sponsored by UNCW Faculty Women's Network. Dr. Barbara Waxman, from the English department, introduced Goodman with a long list of accomplishments and titles. Goodman has been with the Boston Globe since 1967 following two years as an assignment reporter for the Detroit Free Press and an earlier post as researcher with Newsweek. She spent a year at Harvard as a Neiman Fellow and graduated from Radcliffe College, cum laude in 1963.

Goodman's talk ranged from the TV commercial about ring-around-the-collar to the standards and values of the man's world. Her confidence and wit carried the audience through the 60's, which received a round of applause, the 70's, and up to the ideal 80's woman, one who can do everything at once without jeopardizing the family unit.

When asked what she thought the difference was between TV journalism and newspaper journalism, Goodman responded, "As a columnist there is time and space to be ambiguous but a 30 second headline in TV journalism is not enough."

The talk was ended with Ellen Goodman's favorite quote from Jack Kerouac, "Walking on water wasn't built in a day."

"Thin Is In" Not So Hot

BY CAROL TREMBLEY
STAFF WRITER

"Thin is in" ... Westerners of all ages are known by their obsession with physique. Americans in particular are consumed with losing weight or trying to achieve a 'perfect' shape.

This tendency to go to incredible lengths for weight loss seems to start in college; students may go on crash diets or force themselves to overexercise. This can cause health problems and/or excruciating aching muscles, and drain your wallet as well.

Dr. Kathleen Jewell, the director of the Student Health and Wellness Center, says that most people who go on drastic diets "are interested in temporarily looking good rather than being healthy."

These diets can "Deplete you of vitamins and minerals" vital to a healthy body, says Jewell. Even weight loss specialists can advocate some less-than-sound diets, robbing your body of nutrients.

If you are interested in finding a healthy alternative to losing weight, Dr. Jewell prescribes going to LivWell for a computer generated nutrition assessment. This will show you where you are lacking certain nutrients and what you may eat to reduce your weight while eating a more balanced diet. You may also follow a short plan conceived by the Health and Wellness Center.

First, they ask you to keep a three-day diary of your eating habits. This will show them how you eat, what you eat, and at what times are you most likely to eat a meal.

Next, they will ask you to seek some sort of exercise program. This may include any aerobic activities such as walking, running, bicycling, or swimming.

One tip to aid in your weight loss program includes not eating when you are hungry. Cut out excessive between meal snacks or eating just because you are bored and don't have anything else to do. Don't overeat because of some event like watching a sports program or ordering big meals when you go out.

Cutting down on the amount of red meat can also help. The vitamins found in red meat is full of vitamins that can be found in other foods such as fish, chicken, and vegetables.

Utilize behavioral management. Reward yourself for doing something by making a special purchase or taking in a movie—anything that doesn't include food. Celebrate special events by doing some sort of activity besides eating.

Jewell believes students would benefit from an extended program not yet implemented at UNCW. She would like to teach students, especially off-campus students, how to shop for their own food and plan for their healthy meals.

Expanding this idea into reality would include adding a demonstration kitchen, a diet resource library and a Health Educator/Counselor to the university.

There have been hundreds of different diets tried since the first hefty mutated, "I sure could stand to shed a few pounds." But the best way to control your weight is to try to eat right and to always exercise sound judgement while exercising your body.

Noble Takes First In ICCGT

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

"The best strategy is to try and figure out what moves would make your opponent the most uncomfortable," says Matt Noble, third-year president of The Seahawk Chess Club.

Senior Matt Noble came in first place in this year's Inter-Collegiate Chess Games Tournament, February 24-26 in Johnson City, Tennessee. The games were hosted by East Tennessee State.

Matt is very proud of his first-place position over the competing region of North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky and Virginia. Matt says, "This is the highest accomplishment I could attain on the collegiate level, but once I graduate I can continue competing in community open-chess tournaments."

Noble started playing chess ten years ago when his high school's vice principle challenged him to play for Enloe High School in Raleigh. In 1981 Noble won the High School Scholastic Award for his chess playing accomplishments. Since that time Matt has played chess at a competitive level but this recent win proved he is the best in those five states.

Noble says, "Playing chess is a lot of psychological warfare. If you are playing against someone who is quick then you want to play slow and vice versa. It's like you are playing on both sides because you have to figure out what your opponents next move will be as well as your own."

"Matt is one of the strongest young chess experts in the south." To play at the level he says you have to be committed, and Matt is committed," says John Clifford, advisor of the Seahawk Chess Club and professor in the English department.

Noble's other hobbies outside of playing chess are listening to music and watching movies, although he tries to play chess every free moment. This however, is not often because of his studies. Matt is a chemistry major and is hoping to go on to a graduate program in optometry next fall.

When asked what advice he could give to others who wish to compete in chess, Noble says, "Practice helps the most, discovering every possible move and strategy even if that means reading books about chess playing."

It is apparent from Matt's accomplishments that "practice makes perfect."

UNCW Offers Multitudes Of Microchips

BY CAROL TREMBLEY
STAFF WRITER

Most professors encourage reports of professional caliber, typed and checked carefully for spelling. Fortunately for students here, its easy to achieve with UNCW's computer system.

UNCW offers the use of several different types of computers to work with on campus, such as the VAX system, the ever-popular IBM PC, and the Apple Macintosh. But the Apple Macintosh can serve your purposes in a unique and fun way, even providing graphics for your reports.

Dan Sellers, branch manager for The Computer Store on Oleander Drive, says the Mac is a valuable computer because of its ease of use. "This promotes use so you can get more productivity out of your computer," Sellers says.

He feels because of its self-explanatory operations, people are not as scared of the Mac as they would be of a computer they must program document formats into.

Julie Blair, a freshman Early Child Education major, says she uses the Macintosh SE because "I have one at home and I know how to use it." She likes the versatility of typing her rough drafts immediately, saving them on a disk, then going back to make corrections later on.

There are many benefits to using and/or owning a Mac. First, it can be made compatible with IBM programs, so enlarging its capabilities is possible with the addition of a card or microchip.

Also, there are many added options that you may not find in any other computer. Sellers perceives the positive aspects of the Mac as its "screen commands, graphic interface, and its ability to move from program to program easily."

Sellers says the best way to determine which one to buy is according to what your needs are. "There is a large family of Macs available to us, and many programs to fit students needs."

There are basic word processing programs, such as MacWrite and more sophisticated programs like Microsoft Word and Microsoft Word. There also simulation games (like flight/submarine simulation or golf, handball, etc.) for the sport and adventure buffs!

And if you are now all-fired set on getting a Macintosh, now is the best time to do it.

The University Bookstore on campus offers the Mac family at cut-rate prices. You may either purchase entire systems or computer additions that won't leave you sleeping in the doghouse.

These systems range from $1995.00 to $3126.00 (and up) depending on the model you choose. The individual pieces may range anywhere for $47.25 to $4762.00! These prices are opposed to non-educational prices of $3000.00 to $15,000.00! So choose your systems carefully.

What's even better about buying this computer through the school at these prices is purchasing one through the Apple "Student Loan-to-Own" program.

With this plan, you have the option of waiting until you graduate to pay off the loan, which will cover the cost of the items you want to buy. There is an interest rate charged on the loan, but it is much lower than borrowing money from the bank.

There are certain stipulations that must be considered when applying for this loan. Because the applicant must make at least $22,500.00 a year to qualify, this usually leaves the responsibility up to the student's parents to fill out the forms. (This takes some strategic communication skills) The applicant must also retain good credit and satisfactory employment records. And, of course, the student must be enrolled in a college.

The processing time for the application is two to four weeks. Arnold Siko of the University Bookstore says that once they have the check, there is usually a "three to four week turnaround" to receive an order.

But if you choose not to use the Loan-to-Own program, you must give Mr. Siko 10 percent of the purchase price upon ordering.

SEAHAWK SPORTS

Way Out In
(W)right
FieldChris Wright
Sports EditorOpening Day
Highlights

Opening day rang out at ball parks throughout the land and in keeping with opening day traditions, several players and teams distinguished themselves for their notable and notorious feats.

Beginning in the American League where a man who will be drawing social security checks within a couple of years outlived last years Cy Young award winner.

Tommy John, the oldest current player in the majors picked up the win as the Yankees handed Minnesota lefty Frank Viola his first loss of the season.

Dave Stewart, the A's ace righthander who generally wins 18 games before July and then struggles through the stretch, opened strongly, allowing only one earned run while picking up his first win. Stewart is the only major league pitcher to post 20-plus wins in each of the three past seasons.

Wade Boggs, who receives roughly $9,000 per hit, needs only one more hit to pay off his $25,000 debt to Margo Adams. Boggs collected two hits on opening day.

Harold Baines, arguably the most underrated player in the majors, crushed a 400-ft opening day homer as the White Sox cruised to a 9-2 thrashing of the Angels.

New York's (AL) Rickey Henderson, mired in a dead even race with city-mate Darryl Strawberry for most overrated, most irritating, most showboating, and most valuable (which explains why he can get away with the first three) opened up with two hits and three steals.

Oakland opened up its defense of the AL banner with a win over Mark Langston. Mark McGwire hit his first of forty homers.

And, oh by the way, the Orioles, with their opening season victory over Boston, have already won more games this season than they did during the entire month last year. They are in first place for the first time in three seasons.

The American League also had the notorious distinction of hosting the first baseball game. Leading 9-2, Angel's reliever McClure plunked White Sox batter Calderon in the middle of the back. Calderon charged the mound and was immediately pounced on by Parrish. Both benches emptied but peace was restored before Don King could appear with contracts.

The National League was not without some rather outstanding opening day achievements as well.

Barry Bonds opened with four hits, a homer and triple included, and a stolen base and light hitting Expo secondbaseman Tim Foley, who hasn't yet hit his 100th career home run, is tied for the league lead with one.

Philadelphia's future-Hall-of-Famer Mike Schmidt sent out a message to NL pitcher's by driving a 2-1 fastball deep over the ivy and off the True Value Hardware chainlink fence in Chicago. Michael Jack is recovering from a torn rotator cuff and went the entire spring training without a single home run.

"Now you don't want to be too analytical about five at-bats," the seven time NL home run champion said. "But it was a big hurdle for me to clear."

It was Schmidt's 543rd career homer, fifth on opening day, and he leads all visiting players with 49 Wrigley Field dingers.

Los Angeles, last year's North American Champions, opened their campaign losing to Pete Rose's Cincinnati Reds. You can bet that won't happen too frequently, though. The Dodger's off-season acquisitions of Willie Randolph and Eddie Murray will go a long way in procuring a position in this year's league championship.

It didn't take long for the Strawman to strut his stuff, and mouth. He opened with a couple of hits, a few stolen bases, and a typical Met's post-game comment to the effect that the win will serve notice that the Met's are on the war path.

Opening day- some things never change.

UNCW Sweeps JMU - Stays Unbeaten

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Get out the brooms it is a clean sweep for the Seahawks. The Hawks cleaned up on arch rival James Madison by sweeping all three games at Brooks Field this weekend.

The Hawks relied on steady pitching, clutch hitting, and a little luck to defeat the Dukes 6-5, 2-1, and 5-3.

Tommie Adams, named the CAA's Player of the Week on March 20, recorded his fifth win in seven starts and added four more strikeouts to improve his impressive total to 22 on the season.

The Hawks got off to a good start as Adams retired the Dukes in order in the first two innings and added two runs to take a quick 2-0 lead before the Madison's bats suddenly came to life.

"Everyone was so intense before the game. They (UNCW) are usually looser and ready to play. It was Tommy's success in the early innings that got us loose again," said Coach Bobby Gunthrie. However the Hawks would soon have something to worry about. The Dukes soon began to flex their muscles in the fifth inning when they tagged Adams with five runs of their own, on a combination of singles, doubles, and two home runs, including a 400 ft blast over the left centerfield fence.

However, the Hawks slowly crept back in the contest with one and two run innings.

In the top of the seven with the score tied the Seahawks loaded the bases with two outs. The runner on third took a short lead down the line but thought better and began his hasty retreat to the base when the ball fell from the pitcher's glove during his delivery. The stunned umpire had no choice but to call a balk on the JMU pitcher. The winning run crossed the plate unchallenged as the runner was waved in from third.

"I've never been in a game like that before. You're lucky sometimes," said Gunthrie.

Adams got the win (5-2) and Jones the lost (2-1).

Game two of the twinbill featured strong defensive plays and good solid pitching.

UNCW jumped out early in the contest when Randy Fennell jumped on a Brain Kimmel's fastball and sent it over the left field fence on the first pitch of the second inning. Fennell's homer broke him out of a mid-season slump as he went 2-3 on the day and batted in a run. "The last couple of times I've been struggling at the plate but I got a good ball to hit and I managed to get solid wood on it," the senior firstbaseman said. Back to back doubles by Al Catucci and Trent Mongero plated another run.

Jerome Hunt (above) stifled JMU on three hits before being removed because of a tender arm. The junior righthander will be out indefinitely. (photo by Mr. Ed)

Madison retaliated with its lone run of the game courtesy of Steve Schwartz RBI single in the top of the fourth inning. David Morrison improved his stats to 3-1 and the Hawks moved their overall mark to 15-9 and an undefeated mark of 8-0 in the CAA. Brian Kimmel fell to 4-2 with the lost.

UNCW completed the sweep on a JMU team that had outscored the Hawks 40-8 last year in three games.

Jerome Hunt was the starting pitcher for the Hawks in Monday's outing against the Dukes. He went the distance, scattering three hits over seventh innings and recorded his fifth win of the season. The Hawk's hot bats and tight defense once again provided the winning combination for our team.

The Seahawks remain in the top spot in the CAA and hold a commanding three game lead over second place ECU. The win extended the Hawk's winning streak to five games and raised their overall mark to 16-9.

It's Not Anything Until I Call It

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Strike three you're out!! "What, are you blind? Can't you see that ball was at least three feet outside!!"

Yes, it's that time again to curse the men in blue who are often accused of possessing the eyes of a bat and the brain of a newt if they dare utter a word against the home team. Baseball '89 is finally arrived.

Now, having been an umpire for six years, I've been called every name in the book. My eyesight has been questioned more than once, believe it or not! I don't mean to brag, but my optometrist swears I have 20/20 vision. That's probably better than most of the sixty year old coaches out there but with God as my witness they will claim that they can see a 36 inch round ball miss or cross the plate by half an inch from 50 feet away better than I can from 2 feet. Incredible! They must be related to Superman. Strange, they never question my eyesight when the call favors their team.

Then the fun really starts going when a ball is actually hit into play. Rule number one in the umpire's code of baseball; coaches and players don't know diddly about the rule book. The manager will beg, plea, scream, and basically throw a little fit to prove he's right and the ump is wrong. I went through an extensive training session before becoming an umpire; you would think after graduating that I might know something about the rules.

Like rule number 6:02: Managers, Players and personnel who cause disruptions to the game or on the field can be ejected from the game if the umpire feels this measure must be taken. In other words, if you stick your screaming ugly face near mine, you can kiss your fat ass good-bye! Rule number two, Never forget rule 6:02. A good umpire never takes too much guff from any manager. They are the enemy!

All I want is a peaceful quiet game that goes at the speed of light. I root for no one... well, no one except maybe the baseball and the catcher who is catching that hard object in front of me. Remember that the catcher is the only thing standing between my body and 75 miles per hour of hard bound, hard packed twine encased in cowhide.

Rule number three; Always be on good terms with the catcher. The umpire's body, probably next to the catcher's, is the most abused one in the game of baseball. That round ball finds ways of hitting every part of the umpire's body. Knees, ankles, and hand are the three choice spots of that lovely white object from hell. Broken pinkies are a common trait of all umpires, they have to be bent to operate those jammed ball/strike clickers that never work. My favorite injury is the famous foul ball on the top of your toe. That usually brings the crowd to their feet as I do my best impression of Chuck Berry.

Then there is the old ballingyourface/hearbellesringing syndrome. Ever wonder why the metal of the umpire's masks is bent? Well now you know. Along with baseballs, thrown bats, catcher's masks, and spiked cleats manage to zero in on the unprotected areas of an umpire's anatomy. Ever wonder why umpires wear dark blue and black? So the bruises don't show. So take two aspirins and call me when you reach the seventh inning. Rule number four; Take out heavy health insurance before becoming an umpire.

The umpires are trying their best to be perfect, so go easy. If you are considering becoming an umpire, first take a psychiatric evaluation, watch 200 hours of the Morton Downey Jr. show, and never forget the golden law of the umpire codebook: "It's Nothing Until I Call It."

Jernigan Leads Hawks to Championship

BY MALNGUYEN
SPORTS WRITER

The Lady Softball team hit it big as they won the Seahawk Invitational hosted at Bobby Benson Complex last Saturday.

The Seahawks placed four players on the all-tournament team, including tournament MVP Sheri Jernigan who paced UNCW with 12 hits, 11 runs scored and five RBI. Other all-tournament members were right fielder Yuki Henry (11 hits, seven RBI), pitcher-shortstop Rita Scott (2-1 record, 10 RBI), and third baseman Kim Yates who completed the tournament with nine RBI's.

In six games, the Seahawks scored 62 runs and collected 70 hits, while holding their opponents to just 17 runs and 37 hits. Coach St. Ledger attributed their huge success to "timely hitting and good defense."

UNCW's lone defeat came against St. Augustine, the team they defeated 21-3 in the final for the championship.

After Tuesday's split double-header against Coastal Carolina, UNCW walked away with a 28-9 record, achieving the most victories by the Seahawk Softball team ever. Although the Seahawks lost the first game to Coastal(0-2), they retaliated in the second match with vigor to win 6-5, on Debbie Rowe's two-out, two-run double.

Chancellor Suffers Heart Attack

Wagoner In Critical Condition

BY BRUCE FOLEY
STAFF WRITER

The Chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, William Wagoner, suffered a heart attack at his home Sunday, April 9, and was admitted to the Cape Fear Memorial Hospital.

Wagoner's immediate condition was listed as critical on entering the hospital.

"Critical is the term used by the Cape Fear Memorial Hospital when a patient is admitted to the intensive care unit, though doctors regard him as in a 'guarded' condition," said Mimi Cunningham, UNCW spokesperson.

Tuesday, Wagoner was transferred to New Hanover Memorial Hospital where doctors performed a cardiac catheterization test to determine the degree of damage done to his heart. Evaluations of the test concluded that there had been moderate heart damage.

"The tests indicated that his condition could be treated with medication, and that surgery would not be necessary, which is good news," reported Cunningham.

According to hospital officials, Wagoner's condition on Wednesday had improved, allowing him to be moved from the ICU floor to a private room. He is presently listed under serious condition.

In the absence of Chancellor Wagoner, Provost Cahill will operate the position of acting chancellor.

"We have all had to regroup and figure out where we stand, while the chancellor is recovering," said Cunningham.

At this time doctors are still in the process of evaluating how long the chancellor must remain in the hospital.

"In the light of his condition, the possibility of Chancellor Wagoner not returning seems very remote. It's simply going to take time to fully recover," said Cunningham.

Wagoner has been a stable figure on the UNCW campus since its beginning in 1969.

In the event of Chancellor Wagoner not returning to his position, the administration would have to begin a nationwide search for a suitable replacement, while Provost Cahill remained as acting chancellor.

"Since Monday there has been a considerable amount of calls by faculty, staff, the media, and the community, all voicing their concerns," said Cunningham.

President of the Universities of North Carolina System, C.D. Spangler shared his concerns in a written statement.

Kappa Alpha Rules Greek Week

BY RICK HEYMANN
STAFF WRITER

UNCW's 10th annual Greek Week was a fun-filled success once again. Of the twelve Greek organizations that participated, Kappa Alpha took the honor of first place, a step upward from their second place finish last year. The Xi Delta Phi women gracefully clenched second, while third place was taken by the Alpha Phi sorority.

This year's events included a raffle for an Earth Cruiser bicycle, a banner competition, and the climactic float competition. Field events such as the immortal balloon sit, the ridiculous but entertaining tricycle race and the apparently insane scavenger hunt were sideline attractions for the public, but a source of vital points

Fledgling '89 Flounders In Year End Deadline

BY CHAD ADAMS
MANAGING EDITOR

With five of its original 30 staff members remaining, the 1989 Fledgling, UNCW's yearbook, will not be available to the students until early August, according to Fledgling Editor Ed Shiffler.

"We would've liked to have had [a yearbook] by the end of the year, but most of our staff had left by early December," said Shiffler.

The Fledgling was last printed in 1987 and appeared as a traditional 200 page hardbound annual. In the following year the SGA felt that too much was being spent on the annual and reached an agreement with the

"We completed the first sixteen pages by hand with a full staff. Since then, with a reduced staff and the computer, we have completed the rest of the book and are only being delayed now by the processing of pictures," said Shiffler.

The yearbook is tentatively scheduled to print 500 books for the students of UNCW of which approximately 50 have been pre-sold.

Shiffler pointed out the difference between the Fledgling and ECU's yearbook which last year printed 5000 copies and contained 440 pages.

"I appreciate the support we've had from the administration, but am saddened by the lack of spirit and support of the students," then co-editors, Beki English and Jenni Brown, to print a 120 page softbound magazine for the spring of 1988.

After English's resignation and Brown's becoming ill, the Fledgling failed to appear and the future of the yearbook was left in question.

Ed Shiffler, a Fledgling/Out of Chaos photographer, was eventually hired and the yearbook again received funding for this year's edition.

The Fledgling was allotted $13,500 out of which was purchased a $2,600 Macintosh computer which allowed the Fledgling, for the first time, to become a desktop annual. Funding for the yearbook was not allotted until mid-October, however, and the computer did not arrive until the first half of the year's deadline to be met without the aid of the computer.

added Shiffler.

Several students were both surprised and shocked by the Fledgling situation.

"As a rising senior, I think it's sad that I won't have anything to show my kids. It's almost as if the students don't want to remember their college years in a good way," said Kirti Moore, SGA Treasurer. She added, "It's one of the only things that you can carry from your college years to show what was going on while you were here in school."

Entrance Harvey, a sophomore, stated, "The yearbook should be a part of the collegiate heritage," and pointed out that most students "may have a vivid mental picture of your school days now, the yearbook would enhance those memories in years to come."

KAPPA

for the Greeks.

Sean Evans, Co-Captain of Greek Week for the Kappa Alpha, was surprised at some of the unorthodox items needed for the scavenger hunt event in which the KA's and Xi Delta Phi tied for first place.

"We had to collect a 'Spiderman' PEZ dispenser, a 1986 UNCW telephone directory, a stuffed banana, and a whole host of other weird things. We had to collect about 20 different items overnight," he mentioned.

The scoring system used was the same as in previous years. A different point value was ascribed to each event for first through twelfth place. The Greek organization that had obtained the most points at the end of the week determined the winner in the overall competition.

Due to the efforts of UNCW students Shannon Crane and George Popajohn, both of whom were co-chairmen of the six planning committees, the entire week was thoughtfully planned and executed.

"We started planning the week of events back in November of last year. It took a lot of hard work and $4400 to set up [Greek Week], but I feel everything went well," says Crane.

The $4400 to run the whole festival came from the proceeds of the bicycle raffle and Jackson Beverage Company, the official sponsor.

Crane admits that the planning committees fell a "little short" in terms of finances due to expenses, which included more than $3000 worth of tee-shirts and $1400 for the guest speaker, Will Kiem.

Although this year's Greek Week did not vary much from last year in terms of events, there were a few changes in the Greeks themselves.

Of those Greeks that have changed their names due to national affiliation, Tau Nu Pi is now happily wedded to Kappa Alpha, and Gamma Delta Chi is now Alpha Phi. Also, let's not forget the addition of a new sorority, Xi Delta Phi.

There was a time, approximately ten years ago, when the UNCW Greek system and Greek Week included only five fraternities and three sororities. As the Greek community continues to grow, UNCW's Greeks hope Greek Week will reflect that growth.

YEARBOOK from p.1

With the apparent lack of student interest in the yearbook running so high, there is some question as to whether the Fledgling will remain a part of UNCW's media.

Newly elected SGA president Jim Humphries was particularly concerned with the Fledgling plight stating, "I'm planning to set up a committee to review the current media situation here and, as it relates to the Fledgling, this committee will look have to determine whether or not there is a large student demand for the yearbook."

With the Fledgling back in troubled times and facing the possibility of being ended forever, the students of UNCW may become the only campus in the University of North Carolina system to not have a yearbook, which seems to reflect the troubled overall state of the media within the University.

WAGONER

At present, Wagoner is only receiving family and close friends as visitors. The Wagoner family has requested for the time being that all calls and inquiries be directed to the University Advancement Office, at 3171 and 3626.

Chancellor Wagoner's son, Robin Wagoner, expressed thanks to all concerned parties.

"The family appreciates the support and the kindness that everyone has shown during this illness. Things look good and we are expecting a speedy recovery," said Wagoner.

"The entire University community has been greatly distressed by the news that our friend and colleague, Chancellor Wagoner, has suffered a heart attack. Our thoughts are with him and Mrs. Wagoner and their two sons at this time."

"Our concern now is that Bill Wagoner make a full recovery to good health. That is what is important to all of us. We look forward to that outcome and his return to the service of the university. For now we want him to be concerned only with getting well," continued Spangler.

Silverman Elected Governor Of NCSL

FROM STAFF REPORTS

Jeffrey M. Silverman, a rising senior at The University of North Carolina at Wilmington, has been elected governor of the North Carolina Student Legislature (NCSL). The election was held Saturday, March 25 at the 52nd Annual Session of the Student Legislature in the old capitol building in Raleigh.

Silverman appointed two other UNCW students to serve with him in leadership positions during the 89-90 academic year. Leslie Nicholson will serve as treasurer. Executive secretary will be Monica Mohr.

Silverman ran because he "felt it was the best way to serve the students of North Carolina."

Nicholson is looking forward to serving as Treasurer. "Two years ago I assisted Alan Daniels as Treasurer and I wanted to do it again," she said. "Actually, I love the money. I can't wait to sign those big checks!" she laughed.

After being appointed to executive secretary, Mohr commented, "I want my say so in NCSL, and I want to help. In this position I can."

The NCSL has a membership of more than 200 students from 30 colleges and universities statewide. NCSL members learn how the state legislature works. They use the learning experience to participate in and lead a meeting, develop debating skills, express their opinions on the interpretation of some bills, and present policies of their own. Some of the issues handled by the Student Legislature included education condom machines in university residence halls and a ban on ocean dumping.

As governor, Silverman will preside over interim council meetings at various college campuses across the state including one scheduled for April 22-23 at Cameron Hall Auditorium on the campus of UNCW. Silverman will also present to the North Carolina General Assembly a summary of legislation enacted by the Student Legislature. Copies of the documents are sent to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate.

Silverman is also a member of a steering committee for the formation of a United States Intercollegiate Legislature, a national counterpart of NCSL. He will be one of nine governors of state student legislative assemblies to participate in a planned Constitutional Convention to establish the national student forum July 4, 1989, tentatively scheduled for Springfield, IL.

As a member of the NCSL, Silverman serves in an organization whose former members read like a Who's Who of North Carolina politics. Former Student Legislature members include former North Carolina Governors Jim Hunt, Jim Holshouser, Bob Scott, and U.S. Senator Terry Sanford, and 1988 presidential candidate Jesse Jackson.

"We are a model, not a mock legislature; we do what we think the real legislatures should be doing," said Silverman.

D.C.'s Not All It's Cracked Up To Be

BY CAROL TREMBLEY
CONTRIBUTING COLUMNIST

If you ever want to rekindle your appreciation for Wilmington, let me suggest a trip to Washington, D.C.

I had the opportunity to visit our great capital over the past break, and it left me with the overwhelming desire to drop down on Wrightsville Beach and kiss the sand.

What I saw in D.C. was filth, grime, and oppression. Maybe I was disillusioned by everyone telling me what a great place it was and how I see it constantly portrayed in the movies and television as a fast-laned, exciting metropolis.

What my travelling partner and I did experience was less than wonderful.

As we entered the Washington area, we decided to stop at a McDonald's. This gave me my first bad impression of D.C. After dealing with a lazy cashier, who made it look like a major effort to walk across the floor to get me a biscuit, we sat in a table overlooking the main road.

This proved to be very educational. We watched a man walk into a condemned hotel room, give a signal, then duck back into the room. Two more men appeared around the corner and met the man at the door. They proceeded to carry on some sort of deal where money was passed. I assumed they were not paying off a car loan.

After this experience, we drove toward the "mall" where the White House and the monuments are. To get to these marble wonders, we had to drive past tons and mounds of garbage laying all over the streets and yards. (I think people just throw their trash out the window as they run out of room for it in their homes.)

We saw people laying on the sidewalks in cardboard boxes. There were old-fashioned houses and ritzy motels that smacked of nostalgia with carelessly smashed windows.

We saw people laying on the sidewalks in cardboard boxes. There were old-fashioned houses and ritzy motels that smacked of nostalgia with carelessly smashed windows.

bench and ground, wrapped in pink sleeping bags and assorted winter-wear.

I thought to myself, "How in the world can the President overlook this each day?" I mean, this was right in his front yard, where hundreds of thousands of people walk past each day. Diplomats, foreigners and Americans see this depression. They must wonder, "Is this what a free America is all about?"

Personally, I don't like the idea of people from all over the world seeing this as a representation of the rest of our country.

ROTC Informational Seminar For Potential Cadets To Be Given

(UNCW NEWS)-- The Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) program at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington invites all UNCW sophomores to attend its first informational seminar for prospective ROTC cadets at 7 p.m., Wednesday, April 19, in room 100 of the University Union. Refreshments will be served.

During the seminar, students who have attended Basic Camp, known as Camp Challenge, at Fort Knox, KY will share their experiences and respond to questions. Students who participate in the six-week course at Basic Camp earn four academic credits and get a feel for whether ROTC is a Program they wish to join.

Basic is designed for students to attend between their sophomore and junior years of college. Students are paid $680 for their time at Basic Camp, and they can select from four sessions to fit with summer jobs or summer school.

The UNCW seminar for prospective students was the idea of Cadet Toni Benton who is now organizing the event. For more information, call Cadet Jim Wilson or Capt. Kris Prasare at 395-3734.

Boot Camp a New Kind Of Vacation

(NEWS RELEASE)--Summer vacation conjures up thoughts of beautiful beaches, cool shady mountains or hot, dry deserts.

But to some students, summer vacation means six weeks in Kentucky for what some call self-inflicted torture.

These students are attending and attending Basic Camp--known as Camp Challenge.

They will gain leadership skills and receive excellent physical conditioning, plus up to $680, just for attending camp.

Cadet Milkey Avalos developed some solid opinions on the Camp, "Basic Camp pushed me to learn, to lead, to follow, and interact with my constituents on every level," said Cadet Avalos.

Like most students who attend Basic Camp, to qualify for entry into the ROTC Advanced Course, Cadet Avalos was not quite prepared for what he was about to undergo.

"One morning we formed up in front of the barracks. It was a nice summer morning--until HE showed up. He was a 6 foot 2 stocky sergeant. He proceeded to make life interesting for us for the next six weeks. But, when he finished with us, I was in better shape, had learned some valuable skills, and was proud of my achievements. And, I was sure he was satisfied with my progress when I caught him looking at me. That was the only time I ever saw him smile," said cadet Avalos.

Attendants at Basic Camp are provided meals, lodging, and transportation to and from camp. They also have the opportunity to compete for one of the several hundred ROTC scholarships awarded at camp each summer.

"About three weeks into the program, I decided I wanted a career as an Army officer," cadet Avalos said. "So, I went for one of the two-year scholarships and got it," he added.

Not all students who began Basic Camp were there for graduation. Some had decided the training wasn't for them and they returned home. There is no obligation and participants may withdraw from training at any time.

At the end of camp, cadets have an opportunity to sign a contract to enter the Advanced ROTC program. This voluntary contract is not binding until the cadet registers for ROTC at his campus and attends his first class in the fall.

Basic Camp is a very rewarding experience. The students can walk away with the knowledge that they have survived a tough training program. They will experience a personal growth and discover strengths they never knew they had.

ROTC Helps Obtain Professional Goals

(NEWS RELEASE)--The Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) is something that, like a fine wine, gets better and better with age.

Captain Alden Partridge, who started it all in 1819 with his American Literary Scientific and Military Academy, now Norwich University, would not believe what has evolved out of his now seemingly primitive approach to education. He would probably imagine a tank as the work of the devil. And the young lieutenant standing in the turret who is so highly trained he could run this monster through a car wash without getting it wet would really blow his mind.

Directed by the United States Army ROTC Cadet Command, Fort Monroe, Virginia, ROTC combines college courses in military science with summer training sessions to turn students into high-quality Army officers.

Along the way, these students develop the confidence, self-discipline and leadership skills that serve them well in either a military or a civilian career.

Captain Partridge's idea of offering military instruction in college spread to institutions like Virginia Military Institute, the University of Tennessee, and The Citadel. In 1862 the Morrill Act instituted military training at land grant colleges. The idea had become a reality and expansion was on. By the turn of the century, more than 100 colleges and universities offered instruction in military science. Today, there are 317 host institutions and 102 extension centers offering ROTC.

Although almost everyone has heard of ROTC, there are those who still do not understand the ways in which the program helps college students attain their personal and professional goals.

Through a carefully constructed combination of classroom instruction and practical training, ROTC teaches the principles of personnel management and decision making. Cadets are trained to accept increasing responsibilities right from the start. They gain the qualities of leadership which are prized by both industry and the military. Through ROTC training, students have learned to meet problems head-on and solve them. They are leaders, thinkers, decision-makers. Some join the shakers and movers in industry and government that mold and develop our society, economics, and governmental policies.

ROTC is a demanding and challenging complement to the traditional college course. Standards for admission are high while responsibilities are even higher: Officers are ultimately entrusted with the lives of the American people.

ROTC Nursing Scholarships Offered

If you are planning a career in nursing and need assistance with college tuition, take a look at the Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps. Army ROTC offers nursing students four-, three- and two-year college scholarships that pay for most tuition and expenses. An ROTC scholarship will also provide you with $1000 a year in spending money while your scholarship is in effect.

Gain Clinical Experience With ROTC

ROTC's Nurse Summer Training Program will give you a head start in your career by providing added clinical experience at one of the Army's outstanding military hospitals, or five weeks during the summer of your junior year, you'll work one-on-one with an experienced Army nurse in a variety of nursing specialties. You may even have the chance to go to Europe as part of your ROTC nurse training.

If all this sounds challenging and exciting - it is! To find out more about how Army ROTC can help you earn your nursing degree, call Major Gillette at 395-3734.

Yow to Share Cancer Experience

(UNCW NEWS)-- Kay Yow, N.C. State University women's basketball head coach and 1988 United States Gold Medal Winning Olympic Coach, will be the featured speaker at UNC Wilmington at 7:30 p.m., Thursday, April 20 in Cameron Hall Auditorium.

Yow's visit to Wilmington will highlight Breast Cancer Screening Awareness Week, designated as April 16-22. Sponsored by the New Hanover Breast Cancer Screening Program and UNCW psychology department, the program is free and the public is invited to attend. Wilmington City Councilwoman Katherine Hoyt will introduce Kay Yow.

A native of Gibsonville, NC, Yow went to N.C. State in July 1975 from a head coaching spot at Elon College. She holds a bachelor's degree in English from East Carolina University (1964) and a master's degree in physical education from UNC Greensboro (1970).

In addition to leading the U.S. Olympic team to the gold medal, her coaching credentials include three Atlantic Coast Conference Championships for the NCSU Wolfpack. She is a member of the North Carolina Hall of Fame and the Women's Sports Hall of Fame.

In 1987, she was named Delta Zeta National Woman of the Year. There is a chapter of Delta Zeta sorority on the UNCW campus.

Also in 1987, a routine mammogram revealed that she had breast cancer which was treated with a modified radical mastectomy-removal of her right breast and some lymph nodes. She is an outspoken proponent of breast cancer screening and is the honorary chair of the Lineberger Cancer Research Center at the UNC-Chapel Hill School of Medicine.

"We invited Kay Yow to speak about her personal experiences with breast cancer to increase public awareness about screening," said Margaret Holt, community education coordinator with the New Hanover Breast Cancer Screening Program.

"One out of every 10 American women will develop breast cancer at some time during her life. Last year, more than 41,000 women died from breast cancer. But today we have the technology to save lives through screening. In fact, over 90 percent of breast cancer can be cured when found early. We hope the community will attend this important program," Holt said.

The New Hanover Breast Cancer Screening Program is sponsored by the National Cancer Institute in cooperation with physicians in New Hanover County, the Lineberger Cancer Research Center at UNC Chapel Hill School of Medicine, and the Wilmington Area Health Education Center. New Hanover County was one of six sites chosen in the country to receive a grant to develop strategies to increase breast cancer screening. If the program is successful, it may be replicated nationally. The goal of the National Cancer Institute is for 80 percent of all women in this country to get breast cancer screening by the year 2000.

Dr. Carol Pilgrim, assistant professor of psychology at UNC Wilmington, is participating in the project by offering training to area physicians in the newest techniques in clinical breast examinations. Pilgrim has previously conducted research into what motivates women to do regular breast self-examinations.

A View...

As we rapidly approach the end of the semester, I feel it is time to get a few things off my chest. I do not suppose one could call this "A View From the Left," (or the right), it is more appropriately called "A View."

There has been a great deal of talk this year about issues. With the national elections just recently passed and the inauguration of a new president, we have not at all been devoid of "meaningful" conversation. Unfortunately, however, none of it is worth the paper it has been printed on. Everyone has been so concerned with chasing ghost and witches that no one has bothered to look to their own faults.

Last semester was the election, and its play-dough issues. The debate was not so much the direction this nation would take over the next four years as it was how many times we would have to say the "Pledge of Allegiance" along the way. Neither candidate, (nor their supporters), cared to discuss what we are going to do about a troubled economy, the desperate plight of our nations homeless, or how to achieve racial equality and acceptance.

Instead we all seemed to be fighting for the right to be called "the middle-class/middle-ground American. Never in the history of mankind have so many strove so long and so hard to be called "mediocre."

Locally or specifically here on campus, racism reared its ugly head. The problem was not confined to acts, intentional or not, of racism. Nope, we had to compound the issue by instigating a McCarthyistic search for new offenders. No one was safe from the cry "bigot," no, not even the cheerleaders. (Someone is about to get offended here but...cheerleaders, regardless of what they are doing, do not impress me as importantly relevant statements about this or any society).

Unfortunately, despite all the screaming and published lynchings, not one single concrete idea to address this problem either on campus or in society as a whole was developed, mentioned or I dare say, considered.

This semester we got "Awareness." With last week's "Awareness Festival," there was a bit of discussion about issues around the world. Everybody in the liberal movement in this country is so concerned about these important issues. Now, I do not want to sound cruel, many of my friends were heavily involved in the sponsorship and coordination of this event, but...wake up!

The reason I can never be a "card carrying liberal," (sorry George), is the total irrationality of the ultra-left. The liberal movement in this country likes to instigate change - for the sake of change. Dumb! Change is great, until you start trading in one set of problems for another.

Another question is this: Why is it you so often see T-shirts reading: "Save the Whales," "Stop Apartheid," "Save the Snail Darter," etc., and never see any reading "Give the American Indian At Least Some Dignity," or "Stop Apartheid - As Practiced by Israel Against Palestinians?" Is it that the American Indian and the Palestinian rate lower on life charts than whales and snail darters? If so, then I beg to differ.

Until "concern for the world can be come consistent, you can take that "concern," your "awareness" your "meaningful conversation," and stuff it!

Correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't the logo at our school UNC-W? Everything you buy in the bookstore says this in some way or another. Well to make a long story short, change that stupid "loop" W on the center of our basketball court. It looks stupid when everyone else: the fans the cheerleaders, mascot and team players are wearing UNC-W, and on center court we have this large flamboyant "W." Joseph O'Donnell Jr.

Fidelity Is More Than Sexuality

I believe that one of the deepest needs of our human experience is the need for a significant other person in our lives. In most cases that need is acted out in our search for a relationship that can culminate in marriage. Pushing from the other direction, is the awareness of how many marriages are winding up in divorce.

Many young people are growing up as children of divorce and have no good model for a successful marriage relationship. This factor leaves a lot of young people with a good deal of fearfulness about marriage. When our deep human need for long term intimacy intersects with our society-bred fear of failure, the result is yet another element of stress in our lives and the emergence of a deeply significant question, "How can I know that my marriage will work?"

There is no simple answer to that question. Yet there is one element that I want to point to as having incredible significance. It is fidelity, faithfulness between partners at whatever level of relationship they have. Fidelity is usually spoken of in terms of our sexuality. The commandment says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." To my way of thinking, fidelity includes more than our sexuality.

When you get right down to the core of living, we have two elements available to us: our time and our energy. To have any kind of relationship with another person, demands that we spend time and invest our energy with that person.

The more our relationship develops, the more time and energy are spent. If a relationship evolves to the point where two persons become really significant for each other, they will find themselves needing and wanting to spend a good percentage of their time and energy with each other. For me to have a successful family life demands that I spend 35% to 40% of my time and energy with my family. They need and deserve that kind of investment from me. I need and want it too. To take away any significant percentage of the time and energy required to make the relationship work is to be unfaithful, and in a sense, commit adultery.

Any relationship that is going to be meaningful demands a large investment of ourselves. If we divert time and energy needed to sustain that relationship into some other channel, even into our professional lives, then we must face the possibility that we are being unfaithful. Working 60 to 80 hours a week means that a man is simply not available to nourish his relationship with his spouse and/or family. His work can become his mistress.

Fidelity, an indispensable quality of a lasting relationship, calls for the constant reinvestment of the time and energy needed to sustain our beloved. Without such constant nourishment, no relationship can survive.

Advice On The Slightly Wild Side

I will try my luck at being an advice columnist for all of those troubled students out there.

Dear Rick:
I have been living in a funk all year. I feel that I can't do this. I'm right anymore and that nobody likes me. My grades have really suffered because I just sit at home and stare into space. I don't know what to do; I really think that I have to kill myself.
-Loser

Dear Loser:
So? By the way I see that rope is on sale at Lowe's. Better yet, buy some expensive rope and charge it!

Dear Rick:
This is my first semester as UNC-Wonderful. I am having a problem with tests. I mean, I freak out when I'm handed the test. No matter how well I'm prepared for it, I stress out and blow it. What should I do? By the way I'm a business major.
-Stressed

Dear Stressed:
Hey, MELLOW OUT! The way I see it--you have two easy solutions. Number one: Start partying every night and don't ever study. That way, when you flunk a test, it won't be any big deal because you didn't waste your time studying. Number two: Change majors. Become a Communication major. If you stress on those tests, you need professional help.

Dear Rick:
Ever since I left home, I find myself eating at fast food places all the time. I am putting on a lot of weight and feeling sluggish. It seems that all I do is eat. I'd rather eat than do anything. What should I do?
-A Little Overweight

Dear Pig:
Read the answer to the first question.

Dear Rick:
I'm graduating next month and I'm scared to death. What is waiting for me out there? Am I trained to be a slave for some corporation for life? Will making thirty-thousand a year make me happy or is that just enough to keep me wanting more? My parents would be so mad if I didn't enter the business community and be a good boy. What the hell are my alternatives?
-Cold Feet

Dear Slave:
Read the answer to the first question. Hang in there!

Dear Rick:
I am an eighteen-year-old female and in my second semester. All my friends wear short skirts and think nothing of it. I wasn't brought up that way. I have a great body, but I'm too shy to wear sexy clothes, not to mention going out on dates. I think that guys are only after one thing--so I'm scared.
-Shy

Dear Shy:
Your problem is much too complicated to deal with in this column. I really feel that I can help you with your inhibitions. I need to work with you in person though. My number's in the student directory. I'm really excited to hear from you. I mean, we will deal with your problem in a professional manner.

Dear Rick:
I'm graduating in May but I fell like I didn't learn anything. My grades are fine but I'm afraid to get a job. They might think I'm dumb. Halp.
-Ascard

Dear Einstein:
Find a job in television.

Dear Rick:
For the past three months, it seems that I've done nothing but party! I'm always wasted. I mean, that's all I care about; school seems like a waste of time. I'm always out having a good time.

-Party Animal

Dear Animal:
So, ah, what's the problem? Why did you write to me?

Dear Rick:
I'm a College Republican because my father's a republican. Lately I feel like a waste of humanity. I feel as though I'm a selfish sloth and deserve to be beaten daily. I secretly hate Bush because he is just a wishy-washy old fool who won his way into the White House, by using unethical tactics. What do you think?
-Sloth

Dear Sloth:
I think that you have finally awakened after eighteen or so years of sleep. Tell all of your friends about the sale at Lowe's.

Dear Rick:
Why?

Dear Confused:
Because.

Next week is my last column. (sniff)

Exxon Let's Us Pay For The Crude

BY GREG GERRANS
GUEST COLUMNIST

Hopefully by now everyone has heard of the heinous act brought about by the negligence of the Exxon corporation. Last week one of Exxon's tankers spilled 10 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound. That's enough oil to power the entire US for one day! The resulting death to animal and fish populations has been described as 'Animal Ground Zero'.

Local inhabitants have claimed that Exxon has been slow to respond to the spill. Exxon countered the claims by taking out advertisements in many national papers and magazines.

Rather than concentrate their efforts on the imminent threat of the oil spill, they sought to 'clean up' their public image by taking out ads at enormous cost.

To add insult to injury, Exxon has decided to balance their cleanup cost by raising gas prices by ten cents per gallon on the average. Students asked their opinion on Exxon, a multi-billion dollar corporation had negative reactions to Exxon's raising gas prices rather than using their it's own profits to clean up the spill.

"I think it's ridiculous for the customer to have to pay for the company's mistakes," said Chris Wright, junior English major.

"I freaked out," said David Rochelle, freshman Geography major. "I really don't think that it is right; you can't get blood from a turnip, and why should we be the turnip?"

Of course the Alaskan spill is a million miles away.

"That could never happen here," some North Carolinians might think. But could it? Governor Martin is formally considering plans to allow Mobile Oil Corporation the rights to drill off of the N.C. coast. Mobile is attempting to acquire oil rights 30 miles due east of Cape Hatteras. Local citizens have protested the fact that they have no voice in the decision making process.

Mobile has already paid $103,775,000 for a ten year lease. Such large capital allows corporations such as Mobile or Exxon to contribute heavily to political campaigns. They do this so that they can get corporation representatives appointed to the regulatory positions. Once appointed they make it much easier for the corporate giants to get around laws and protective measures such as environmental protection laws. Governor Martin has required an environmental impact study be done before drilling starts. Some groups argue that Martin is stalling so that drilling can occur once the current spill has blown over.

The simple fact is that the damage from the Alaskan spill will never fully go away. The situation may get better, but the damage is far too great to ever be the same. Can you imagine a similar tragedy off the coast of N.C.?

Our beaches would be permanently damaged, loss of sea life, clean water, and vital shell beds would be catastrophic. Financially speaking, such an accident would deal a death blow to N.C. fishermen, tourist business, and developers.

Finally, the clean up cost would easily run into the millions. Corporate giants don't worry about lost wild life, state revenue, or cleanup cost, they simply do as any other corporation. They make the consumer pay for their mistakes.

Modern Fashion: The Rip Is Hip

(CPS) Kamal Mahmood is an artist. In an El Paso, Texas factory, he dresses models in Jou Jou jeans, and decides where to rip the pants. It is serious business.

"The existence of the rip is crucial to enhance the girl's body," he says. "If you put the rip in the wrong place, it just looks like a rip."

And if he does it right, Jou Jou will sell a lot of pre-ripped jeans to a lot of collegians. Jou Jou, Levi Strauss and Guess? are all bringing out new lines of already-ripped jeans in hopes of capitalizing on students' fondness for shredding their clothes.

"People like to have their jeans rip and tear on their own," conceded Debbie Gasparini of Levi Strauss, the San Francisco-based company that will soon introduce "strategically torn" jeans and jackets in its Silver Tab line. "This is for someone who decides they want them now."

Jou Jou decided to start selling pre-ripped jeans after its merchandisers noticed punks in London were wearing torn pants. "We thought it was cute," said Jou Jou's Wendy Lewov.

Maybe so, but fashion moves quickly. Guess?, said a spokeswoman for the Los Angeles clothesmaker, marketed a line of ripped jeans as early as 1985.

"They did very well," the spokeswoman, who asked not to be named, sniffed. "Levi's is a little slow on the stick."

Fast or slow, some wonder if students actually will buy the pants.

"I rip my own jeans," reported Kevin Bedford of The Gap store just blocks away from the University of Vermont campus.

I don't think kids who rip jeans themselves are going to pay for ripped jeans.

Julianne Hoffman of Peacock, a boutique frequented by University of Wisconsin-Madison students, concurred. She recalled she worked at a department store in 1988 that tried to hawk pre-ripped Union Bay jeans.

"They just sat on the racks," Hoffman said. "I saw a girl with a pair on the other day. I think she was the only one who bought a pair."

Undaunted, Jou Jou and Levi's Strauss are preparing more for stores.

Levi's Gasparini won't say how her company tears the pants, divulging only that "it's not a cookie-cutter process" and promising that no two pairs will be alike.

Jou Jou's Lewov, on the other leg, recounted how she and her colleagues labored in a design studio in New York for the right look. "We sliced a pair of jeans three times. Then we washed it with stones and acids" until the razor slices began to fray.

Then they entrusted the rest to Kamal Mahmood, an Iraqi immigrant who works in Jou Jou's El Paso plant. Mahmood is hard to please.

"You have to be careful because you want to expose flesh, yet leave a lot to the imagination," he says.

Once he positions the rips, he transfers his vision to bolts of denim as he runs them through machinery. "As the machines cut the fabric, the rips are put in place."

The rips in Jou Jou's jeans are wide and unpatched, while Levi's opts for more conservative tears plugged by squares of colorful cloth.

To tempt people to buy them, Jou Jou advertises in youth magazines like "Mademoiselle," "Glamour" and "YM." Gasparini said Levi's sells to young people mostly through its "501 Blues" tv and print ads.

Such companies, one industry insider who requested anonymity said, really don't target college students as a subset of the "youth market." It's just too expensive to try.

He also thinks the ripped style is too "strong" a look to last long. He predicts novelty finishes like acid washes and antiqued looks will be more enduring.

And Levi's, going back to comb London's youth scene for new ideas, thinks chinos will become popular again on campuses next year, Gasparini said.

But at Vermont, baggy pants seem to remain the bestsellers at The Gap, Bedford said. "The women are all buying men's pants about two sizes too big."

The latest fashion: The existence of the rip is crucial.

Nation's Banks Stop Making Student Loans

(CPS) A California business's mishandling of $650 million in student loans has set off a chain of events that convinced some of the nation's biggest banks to announce in late March that they would stop making student loans.

Financial aid experts say the moves mean students may have to work harder to get Stafford Loans for next school year, and that "high risk" students -- those who go to certain schools -- may not be able to get them at all in the future.

"It's moving in that direction," said Stephanie Massey of Florida's Department of Education student aid office. "More and more lenders are eliminating vocational, proprietary and community schools from their list."

Banks consider trade school students as "high risk" because they are generally less well off than students at four-year campuses, and because they graduate into lower-paying jobs, she explained.

Community and junior college students -- a much bigger group -- will still be able to get loans, observers said, but they may have to dig harder to find banks who make loans to two-year campus collegians.

The impact, however, on students will be minimal, said Jim Palmer of the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges in Washington, D.C.

Only 9 percent of nation's community college students take out Stafford Loans, Palmer said, because "most are part-time, and tuition is comparatively low."

"At least now, the good four-year universities have plenty of sources for student loans," said Fritz Elmendorf of the Virginia-based Consumers Banking Association (CBA). "On the edge is where it's being felt."

Massey predicted that soon not enough money will be available, making lenders even more selective. "We're reaching a point where it's starting to be felt."

At Iowa Western Community College, for example, financial aid director John Rexley "used to get letters at least once a week from big banks in the East wanting to lend to our students. Now I get terse letters from regional banks who say they're no longer offering student loans."

Angered by a March 1 U.S. Department of Education decision not to bail out United Education Software (UES), a California company that had serviced $650 million in student loans that have not been repaid, Citibank -- the biggest Stafford lender in the country -- said March 19 it would make it harder for students to qualify for loans.

At the same time, Chase Manhattan Bank in New York announced it would no longer loan money to trade school students. In Nebraska, Commercial Federal Savings and Loan decided to scrap its student loan program. In California, the Bank of America may give up Stafford Loans if the Education Department lowers the loan's profitability, marketing executive Grant Cuellar confirmed.

Many smaller banks, Elmendorf reported, also have stopped making student loans.

The reason is that they have become less profitable for banks, and now thanks to the Education Dept. decision, riskier.

The Education Dept., which oversees most federal college program, has been waging a vigorous campaign to decrease the default rate on Stafford Loans -- formerly called Guaranteed Student Loans -- for years, as the amount of money in default rose from $330 million in 1983 to $1.7 billion in 1989.

Money spent to reimburse banks for uncollected loans, of course, is money that otherwise would be loaned out to students to pay for college.

In 1986, frustrated government loan officials suggested forbidding banks from making loans to students who attended schools at which the default rate was higher than 20 percent.

The suggestion, which Congress is still weighing, was aimed mostly at trade schools -- for-profit beauty, truck repair, business and technical schools -- that tended to have the highest default rates, followed by smaller two-year community and junior colleges.

UES's extraordinary high default problem was one of the first to draw Washington's attention, and, according to its own guidelines, the Education Dept. announced in February that it would not reimburse banks for the $650 million in loans student had failed to repay.

Despite an appeal by American and Japanese banks to make and exception in UES's case -- they argued that failure to "guarantee" the loans would convince banks to stop making Stafford Loans -- the department decided in early March it would stick to its policy.

Banks have been announcing tougher student loan policies ever since, culminating in the Citibank and Chase Manhattan retreats in mid-March.

"We are confident that sources of loans will continue," said Mary Crawford of the Dept. of Education. Elmendorf sees it differently.

"It likely will be tougher (for students to qualify for loans). It's already tougher in a lot of categories."

Iowa Western students ultimately haven't had trouble getting loans, Pixley reported, although lenders are "a lot more cautious."

Dallas Martin, president of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators in Washington, D.C., said the recent events won't have much impact, at least initially, on the availability of student loans nationwide. However, it is "one more nail in the coffin," pointing out the weaknesses in the system.

A certain number of defaults are to be expected, says Elmendorf. The loans are meant to guarantee access to higher education. The goals of reducing defaults and of providing loans for all are contradictory.

Adelphi Asks President To Resign

(CPS) -- Students and professors at Adelphi University in New York have asked their president to resign.

And as if there was an epidemic of troubles at the top, the University of Maine, Pima Community College, Sangamon State (in Illinois) and Georgia State universities also had presidents, board members and officials fall into trouble the last week of March.

At Adelphi, various factions are trying to force President Peter Diamandopoulos, who reportedly had been censured by students and faculty members while president of Sonoma State University in California from 1977 to 1983, to quit.

"There is a great feeling of turmoil," said Ronald Feingold of Adelphi's Faculty Senate. "There has been mismanagement of the university in all different areas. Each department has its own Diamandopoulos story to tell."

Feingold said no one at Adelphi knew of Diamandopoulos's problems at Sonoma State, where he was censured three times for incidents including over-riding tenure requests. In 1982, both faculty and students called for his removal. He resigned a year later.

"The faculty members on the search committee were unaware of his problems with tenured faculty at Sonoma," Feingold maintained.

Diamandopoulos, who said he won't step down, was hired in 1985 by the school's trustees, who never revealed the other candidates' names.

Such secrecy, though common when trustees hire new presidents, prompted the Atlanta Constitution newspaper to sue Georgia State University the last week of March, hoping to force GSU's regents to reveal who they're considering to become the Atlanta school's new leader.

But GSU student government member Todd Auten thinks the secrecy search is "no big deal."

"A lot of people have a lot to lose. If they were to release the candidates' names, the ones who didn't get hired would lose their (present) positions," he argued.

At Adelphi, Diamandopoulos' resume "was an open book," at least among the trustees, said university spokesman Joseph Mancini.

The board of trustees was thoroughly familiar with his background and fully aware of his problem with faculty at Sonoma State.

Some legislators in Maine, meanwhile, were angered by University of Maine President Dale Lick's March 28 remarks at a student government meeting about black students' athletic skills, and called for an investigation.

"As blacks begin to get into sports, Lick said in response to a question about the number of black athletes on campus, 'their natural athletic abilities come through. They have actually done research on an average black athlete versus an average white athlete in basketball where a black athlete can actually out-jump a white athlete on average.'"

At Sangamon State, President Durward Long returned to his office from a two-month absence to recover from alcoholism and exhaustion only to be slapped with sexual harassment charges that, the complainants said, span his four years in office.

AIDS Fear Spreads: Fletcher Speaks Out

Dr. Suzy Fletcher, Chairperson of the Graduate program School of Nursing at Indiana State and certified sex therapist, spoke in Cameron Hall Tuesday as part of the AIDS awareness program.

motivated to practice safer sex," said Fletcher.

Those present at the panel discussion had the opportunity to come into contact with persons living with AIDS.

Dr. Kate Bruce, Assistant Professor of Psychology who teaches Human Sexual Behavior, moderated the event and introduced the panelists.

On the panel were Leo Teachout, Executive Director of the Gay Rights Organization of Wilmington (GROW), Coordinator of GROW AIDS Resource Project and Wilmington Citizen of the Year; Aaron, Jamie and Faye, all of whom are directly affected by the AIDS virus.

Teachout explained that GROW provides humanitarian services to persons with AIDS and their families while also providing education about the virus.

"All persons with AIDS will eventually die and become no more than a statistic. They are all unique individuals who need support and need to be left to make decisions," said Teachout.

of ten years committed suicide. When he was informed of his positive HIV test, Jamie's life also changed greatly. He lived on the streets of Atlanta, GA, tried unsuccessfully to commit suicide, and was admitted to Cherry Mental Hospital before coming to Wilmington to seek support from Teachout.

"If it weren't for GROW and Teachout, I would probably be dead. They gave me a message of hope and support, and rid me of the fear that I would be left alone," said Jamie.

Seated next to Jamie was his new lover, Faye.

Faye considers himself to be "one of the lucky ones." He is a gay male who has tested HIV negative.

"Living with AIDS is like a recurring nightmare everyday," said Faye.

He stated that the fear of AIDS does not bother him as much as the ignorance towards the disease. "What people imagine because of ignorance is what we need to be afraid of," said Faye.

"As people experience AIDS from their friends and family, or it is brought home to their community, they will be more motivated to practice safer sex."

Teachout then introduced friend and advisee, Aaron.

Aaron, a gay male, explained that he was in a state of shock when he tested positive to the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) in January of this year. He admitted having unprotected sex only once.

"Only one time—that's all it takes and I'm proof of that," he said.

Although he is not yet symptomatic, Aaron admits that the virus has changed his life immensely.

"I've made mental readjustments in my life. Suicide is an option—I don't know how much future I have left, but I hope it's enough to do the rest of the things I want to do before I get sick," wept Aaron.

Other panelists were equally emotional while speaking.

Before being diagnosed in September of 1987, Jamie's lover

Although all of the panelists were gay males, Teachout explained that for reasons of confidentiality others refused to attend. He further explained that out of the seven AIDS cases he has worked with, thirty-five percent are heterosexual.

Teachout, Fletcher, and Deborah Haywood, Coordinator for the Office of Health Promotions/LivWELL, agreed that all persons need to be concerned about the threat of AIDS. It is through programs such as these that student awareness, concern, and education about the virus will be raised.

Fletcher emphatically stated, "AIDS is a war we won't win today or tomorrow, we are in it for years!"

Until this war is won, Fletcher said that students ages eighteen to twenty-two need to grow up and rid themselves of the attitude "nothing will happen to me!"

Step-N-2 Thrills Students With Album Release Party

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

Last Friday night an up-and-coming band, Step-N-2, performed in Rm. 100 for an album release party. This young band has, in my estimation, what it takes to make the big time.

They have a good sound live as well as on their album, great vocals, a lot of energy and mobility, bringing their show off the stage and into the audience, and most importantly this band has musical talent.

This last element I find lacking in many bands today, so hearing this well-endowed band was a pleasure. The music has substance and the lyrics a message, all of which makes for interesting as well as enjoyable listening.

The band is comprised of lead singer Patrick Gray, guitarist Slugger, Bassist C. J. DeBerg, drummer Jimmy Collins, and saxophonist Brad Hubbard. Hubbard is a new addition to the band, adding a smooth touch to the band's rock sound.

The first release from their album, Real World, is "Passion for Fashion", an upbeat song that should get the band recognition.

This album is full of songs with great rock sound like "Real World," "Friday Night," and "Cry The Children," but also contains a ballad called "60 Seconds" and "Bad Girl" which has a reggae sound.

I was able to talk with lead singer Patrick Gray after the show. He informed me that band members Slugger and Jimmy have a strong rock-n-roll background while the other members come from a classical/jazz background.

With talent and hard work, the band feels they can succeed in the music business. "We see ourselves at the forefront of the popular music scene in the future."

The band's unusual name signifies forward movement and is incorporated into the album cover. On the cover, a man is shown leaving a cartoon world to step into the "real world."

The band was brought to UNCW by ACE. The entire affair was an impressive production, but unfortunately only a small number of people (around 100) took advantage of a night of great entertainment, food, and prizes.

Those who did attend enjoyed the show tremendously and had plenty of room to dance, which was taken advantage of by all. Gray commented on the disappointing turn-out, "If those who were here enjoyed it, that's all that matters."

I suppose I shouldn't be surprised at the low numbers. UNCW is Mecca to all those who don't get involved and these individuals missed a treat Friday night!

The Diviners Performance

BY RODNEY T. INGLE
STAFF WRITER

The University Theatre has begun its rehearsal of The Diviners, a play written by Jim Leonard Jr. This was and is Leonard's first and only play to date. It was written by Leonard as a senior in college, and was produced in the early 1980's.

The cast includes local Wilmington residents as well as UNCW students. The cast is as follows: Steve Boardman; a non-student who has appeared in a former production of Happy Haven; Juli Brockmann; UNCW senior, who has appeared in Noises Off, and Painting Churches; Joey Collins; freshman-UNCW. This is his first show. Gregory Cooper; a non-student playing the part of "Buddy" in The Diviners. David George; another non-student playing the part of Buddy's father: Ferris Layman. Amy Madura; junior-UNCW. Jennie Mae Layman. Randy Soare; junior-UNCW plays the part of the ex-preacher C.C. Showers. Soare has also played in Painting Churches.

Other students involved with smaller but vital roles are, Cindy Warren; junior-UNCW, Lisa Snow; soph.-UNCW, Annette Watlington; senior-UNCW, and Steve Vernon; junior-UNCW, who played in Noises Off.

The play is being directed by Frank P. Trimble; a professor in the Communications Dept. It will open April 12th, and run through April 15th. Wednesday through Saturday, the performance will begin at 8:00 p.m. Sunday, April 16th, the production begins at 2:30 p.m.

In regards to this article, Trimble stated, "To read an article about this play, or reading a plot summation of it will leave a dry taste in your mouth. It is a play that has to be seen to really get the effect."

Well, here is the plot summation anyway. The play takes place in the town of Zion, Indiana. Pop. 40. The year—1931: The depression.

14 yr. old Buddy, is a spaced-out kid with a terror of water. When he was young, he almost drowned, and his mother, trying to save him, did drown. Now, Buddy cannot even look at or get near water. Thus, he hasn't had a bath in years.

The whole town of Zion takes care of Buddy and makes sure he has food and clothes.

There is much symbolism throughout the play. The townspeople, though they are not really located in the Bible Belt, are really in search of spiritual inspiration.

When Showers meets Buddy, he really wants to help him to overcome his fear of water, and thereby, maybe help himself to decide if he will carry on his family tradition of preaching.

The townspeople see this as an act of God—this ex-preacher befriending a distraught 14 yr. old. This "miracle," however, backfires with an ironic twist.

There are some very emotional moments in the play, one of which is where Showers tries to convince Buddy that rain won't hurt him. Another with Showers, Ferris Layman, and Buddy's sister try to alleviate his ringworm by bathing him.

This is the last official production by the University Players this semester and it is definitely one that shouldn't be missed. On a six star scale, this play is a solid five.*****

Festival Enlightens Students

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

The Awareness Festival that took place on UNCW campus last Saturday and Sunday was an attempt to make students more aware of different groups and causes that they can become involved with. The festival provided tables of information on different groups and people from the organizations to talk with as well as providing entertainment.

Senior Communications

major, Missie Hayes, said, "I think it's [the festival] fun. We need to do stuff like this more often."

One of the many organizations represented at the festival was Cape Fear Literacy Council. Their spokeswoman on hand Saturday, Loreta Grady explained the organization's reason for participating. "We'd like people to sign up to take our next workshop to learn how to teach people to read and then have them volunteer."

The Literacy Council is interested in informing people, especially college students, what their organization does and the importance of their work. They'd like to encourage college students to donate their time and abilities to teach adults to read.

The Campus Awareness Organization put a lot of effort into the festival and according to the group's co-chairman, Jeff Hinkle, the group is quite pleased with the results of their first annual Awareness Festival.

Movie Review

BY ALLEN RAY
STAFF CRITIC

Dead Calm-4 STARS. There have been a lot of movies lately with Dead in the title, (Dead Heat, Dead Bang), but none of these Dead movies come close to Dead Calm.

This Australian thriller begins with John, a naval commander finding out that his infant son was killed and his wife (Rae) badly injured in an auto accident.

To help Rae overcome her grief, John takes her sailing until she can face going back to their home and all the memories of the accident. After a few weeks alone, Rae and John find a boat adrift with only one person aboard.

The mysterious stranger tells John and Rae that there were 7 other people aboard but they all died from the canned salmon.

Of course John doesn't believe him and goes to investigate, leaving his wife alone with the stranger. I personally wouldn't have, but since he does, the movie takes off and never slows down. Exciting, clever and well acted Dead Calm is anything but "dead".

Kinjite-(Forbidden Subjects)-This movie deserves a long, painful review that tears it apart. I feel it deserves this because it was a long, slow, and painful movie.

Charles Bronson drags his feet through this confusing, boring, and often dumb movie.

In the first scene Bronson says, and I quote "There's Duke, that sleazebag." From that display of sparkling dialogue, this waste of a movie goes downhill.

Save the three dollars for a student ticket and buy some sharp tacks and roll in them. You will probably enjoy this more than Kinjite.

Azalea Fest Begins

LEIGH DURHAM
STAFF WRITER

$20.00.

The 42nd Annual Azalea festival will officially begin Thursday April 13th at 10:15 a.m., with the arrival of Queen Azalea on the Henrietta II at Riverfront Park.

This year's queen is Rebecca Arthur, who stars as "Mary Ann" on the television show "Perfect Strangers".

She and her court will be at UNCW Saturday night in Trask Coliseum for the Queen's Coronation Pageant and concert. The concert will be given by Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons. Admission: $20.00.

Also at UNCW, Hall and Oates will perform April 13th at Trask Coliseum. Admission: $20.00.

Other events (that cost less) include a garden tour ($6.00) April 14-16 and a house tour ($6.00) April 15-16. There will also be tours of military vessels April 14-16 from 10-5.

To round out the entertainment will be an Azalea Festival Variety Show April 14th at 6:30 p.m. in Legion Stadium. Free.

The show will feature Lorrie Morgan of Grand Ole Opry fame and Buck Trent, a world renowned banjo player. Local talent will also be showcased. A fireworks display will be held after the show.

Also, many different acts will be performing throughout the festival. The Azalea Festival is held downtown April, 13-16, including "Lou's Blues Revue" (April 15-16). A jazz group, Azalea Festival President, Bill Cameron, says, "The 1989 Azalea Festival Street Fair truly will be the biggest and best ever planned."

Obviously there is something for everyone at this year's Azalea Festival!

'MURDER ON FLINT STREET'

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

Thursday morning was warm and humid after a long night of rain. With moisture on his brow more from worry than exertion, Michael Montgomery dashed past a half dozen men in uniform to make his way to the front door of the house on Flint Street, only to meet his sister on her way out. Her face paper white she staggered onto the porch, coughing and choking as her stomach emptied onto the steps, spattering the shiny black shoes of two police officers.

Laurie was only vaguely aware of her brother and the plain clothes detective as they helped her into a lawn chair. She sat dumbly as Michael questioned her, "Are you all right? What happened?"

"She identified the body," the detective supplied sympathetically. "I'm Detective Walker. I'll need to ask you both some questions when you're ready. He didn't have to wait for the young man to introduce himself. Since the late Mr. Montgomery's will was contested by his offspring a year before, photos of every family member had been plastered across the tabloids for weeks. "Do you happen to know Mrs. Edward Montgomery's whereabouts? I believe she's your aunt."

"As you can see we are not ready for any questions," Michael shot back hotly. Then the detective's words sank in, "What do you mean my aunt's whereabouts? You mean the body isn't...?"

"That's right," Walker replied. "The deceased is one Roger Adams of 321 Bradsher Lane, attorney at law with the firm Holsten, Holsten, and Adams. We haven't been able to locate the owner of the house, Mrs. Montgomery." He glanced at the girl in the chair, "I think Miss Montgomery could do with some brandy. I noticed some inside. If you don't object, I'll take the liberty of bringing her some."

"Of course," the younger man agreed.

With swift steps Walker crossed the lawn and made his way through the maze of people conducting the investigation of the scene. It looked as if Smitty had finished snapping pictures and the stretcher stood ready along with two attendants who looked as if they had been ready since yesterday. He chuckled. They'd have to cool their heels and wait for the Medical Examiner's O.K. before they moved the body. He glanced at his watch. The M.E. should be there any minute; they wouldn't have to wait long.

His partner walked up as he poured the liquor, "Isn't it a little early for that," he joked, "you're still on duty."

Walker laughed, "It's for the girl, you knucklehead."

"Oh yeah? I hear she puked on two uniforms outside." Jones, who managed to find humor in everything, obviously thought this was a lark. "Reminds me of locking up the drunks every Friday night. They all puke."

Turning to go, Walker asked, "They find that slug yet?"

"Yeah, lodged in the kitchen wall and surprise, it was from a .357 magnum."

That wasn't much of a surprise, as his partner well knew. They had both guessed it would be from a high caliber weapon after examining the corpse. Turning to go once more, he ran into the Medical Examiner and paused to answer his questions.

Michael's thoughts were in a whirl. He had assumed that the body found in his aunt's house would naturally be his aunt. She had been sick since her daughter's funeral two months before. It seemed hardly conceivable that the family's young lawyer would expire and in his aunt's house.

It appeared that Laurie was also shocked by Roger's death. As far as he knew, Laurie hadn't spoken more than two words to Adams in the three years he had been the Montgomery's attorney. He wondered if there was more between them than he had thought. He hoped her state of mind was due to the shock of viewing the body and not because of any relationship between the two. As the trustee of their late father's estate, Adams was the enemy.

Walker rejoined the two on the lawn and helped Michael cajole his sister into taking the brandy. She managed a swallow of the warm liquid which brought some of the color back to her wan face.

"There was so much blood," she said with a quaver.

"Blood," Michael repeated in a voice much higher than normal.

When his sister remained silent, he gave the detective a questioning look. He sure looked innocent thought Walker as he answered the implied question, "Mr. Adams was found dead of a gunshot wound at approximately 8:15 this morning by the maid, Teresa Valenzuela. We haven't been able to locate the owner of the house, your aunt Mrs. Harriet Montgomery. Do you know her whereabouts?"

"No, I haven't seen her since Tuesday, but you might talk to Rev. Bloom. She went to church last night."

"If you haven't seen your aunt since Tuesday, Mr. Montgomery, how do you know she went to church last night?" Walker asked sharply.

"Because she goes to church every Wednesday night. I don't like what you're asking," Laurie answered for him suddenly sounding like her old self.

Maxwell Jones joined them just in time to hear the girl's remark. We're going to have our hands full with these two he thought. Everyone in town had heard of Eugene Montgomery's spoiled-rotten heirs.

The detectives questioned them thoroughly about their whereabouts the night before. Michael claimed he'd been with his girlfriend Maureen Drew for dinner and dancing at Sporty's and had taken her home around midnight and then gone home himself. Laurie claimed she'd been home all evening reading.

"What were you reading?" Jones asked watching her closely. No girl this good looking would sit home reading he reasoned.

It took several seconds for her to manage a reply. "Proust," she said finally.

"And you didn't go out at any time last night," he pressed.

"I told you, I was home all evening," she said not meeting his eyes.

Walker and Jones let the young people go after advising them to stay available for further questioning.

"You buy that?", Max asked as soon as they were out of earshot.

"Not until we check it out," was his partner's grinning reply.

Six o'clock arrived with many questions answered, unfortunately the answers created several puzzling new questions. While Walker questioned socialite Maureen Drew and talked with the employees and the previous night's guests at Sporty's to verify Michael Montgomery's alibi, Jones checked out his sister's story.

The dissatisfaction of the Montgomery heirs with the trustee of their father's estate gave them both good reason to want Roger Adams dead. With Adams out of the way the heirs would come into their inheritance immediately which was more convenient than waiting for their thirty-fifth birthdays as Eugene Montgomery's will had stipulated.

Both Walker and Jones had thought at least one of the alibis wouldn't pan out, but both were surprised when discrepancies were found in both.

(Tune in next week for the dramatic conclusion to "Murder on Flint Street" and discover Aunt Harriet's whereabouts, who bumped off the lawyer, and why!)

Way Out In
(W)right
FieldChris Wright
Sports EditorBaseball the Way it ought to be Played

Taking a cue from Thoreau, Emerson, and Wordsworth, I went back home to Cary this past weekend to get back in touch with the real baseball world.

Not the one where million dollar athletes walk out because they don't like the way the bats are aligned in the rack, but the real world, where little kids who hit routine one homers to the shortstop actually run like there is no contract extension to first base.

The last time I saw a major leaguer run out a routine grounder was the last time I saw Pete Rose in uniform, and he probably only did it because there was money at stake.

I went to Carl A. Mills Field, a dainty little ball park, suitable for tee-ball players to hone their skills, a place where I played a game or two on as a kid.

You will find no astroturf. The infield is composed of a carefully mixed percentage of pebbles and red clay. The outfield is a combination of green grass and weed, and slopes slightly uphill as one approaches the left field chain-link fence.

There is a barn behind the fence in left. It was the target for which all right handed hitters strived for.

Hitting one off the shed in left meant a possible kiss from Lisa Fitzsimmons, the original kissing bandet and prettiest 8-year old I have ever seen. Occasionally, she'd even let you call her your girlfriend.

Of course, in order to clear the fence, you had to clear Jerry Pegram. He was the neighborhood bully, two years our senior, and a good foot taller than most of us. Most importantly, though he was Lisa's man.

I watched eight little boys and one little girl take a round of infield practice. I was amazed at how tiny they seemed.

I laughed when a slow grounder headed in the general vicinity of the shortstop crawled through his legs and judging by the manner in which the entire team gave pursuit afterwards, you would have thought they were fighting over the last egg on Easter Sunday.

I watched their swings, at times it seemed as though their bats were larger than they were and I wondered how on earth these mighty mighties could muster the strength to swing them.

I saw plenty of smiling. I can't recall the last time I saw a major leaguer smile, but I've never been around on payday, either.

Bubblegum was being chewed instead of tobacco. Bright, bewildered eyes often stared in disbelief as their melon-basket sized gloves came up empty time and time again.

I knew some of the kids, and most knew me. I talked to this one little boy. He was standing at the fence. He wore number three because of Dale Murphy. He hit much like Murphy did last year, but he's got a lifetime to improve.

Another boy, meanwhile, stepped in the batters box and began to pound out line drives. I figured him to be the coaches son.

I turned to the small boy at the fence. "You got a girl friend?" I asked, already aware that he was smitten over the pretty young thing on the mound whose long blonde hair was hidden by her cap.

"Had one," he said as the ball caromed off the bright red shed.

I smiled. This was indeed the way baseball was meant to be played.

Yow Gets Through Life with Three F's

BY TASHA ROONE
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

Kay Yow winner of the Carol Edmund award, coach for the Lady Wolfpack of N.C. State and the 1988 Women's Olympic Basketball team in Seoul was present in Trask Coliseum last week. Joy Philips, FCA (Future Christian Athletes) leader, tried to get Mrs. Yow here at UNC-W for the past three years. However, until now it was difficult to fit the visit in to her schedule.

Mrs. Yow has been the women's basketball coach at State since the early 80's, in which she has coached the Lady Wolfpack to 464 wins. It is no wonder that she took her team to the NCAA championship in 1987. However, Mrs. Yow says, she owes it all to God. "By putting him first, I was able to accomplish all that I strived for." Statements like these were part of a most inspiring speech.

Before the speech, FCA sponsored a reception in honor of their distinguish guest. Everyone that ventured out mingled, ate, laughed, and talked with each other as well as Kay. For someone with her success and prestige, she had an excellent rapport with the people.

Most of the members of the UNC-W women's basketball team were there and talked with her. One of the most frequent asked questions was, "How did it feel winning the Gold?" Her reply was simply, "It was great!" Soon everyone headed for the gym to hear this wonderful woman speak.

Indeed she did not disappoint anyone with her speech. Mrs. Yow says, despite of her battle with breast cancer she has accomplished plenty that she is specifically proud of; the World Championship Gold in '86, the Goodwill Championship Gold in '88, three Atlantic Coast Conference Championship titles and of course the '88 Gold Medal in Seoul. All of these were made possible by the three F's, faith, family, and friends, Yow referred to in her speech.

Mrs. Yow spoke of faith and it's importance in all that you do. Her battle with cancer taught her that you do not have control, only God has control. She said, "If you have a dramatic event happen to you, you must search for meaning, because there is meaning if you have faith and trust in the Lord." The message is she says, "All things are possible through him." Surely he has made things possible for her.

Mrs. Yow confessed that when she first started out she had goals, and she was obsessed with basketball. "After I won my first championship, I was on a high. I can go back as far as winning my first conference championship in high school; then I was also on a high. The state championship soon followed, and I was on a high. Others came after and so did the highs." She says, this is the same way that you become addicted drugs or alcohol.

It takes more the next time to satisfy you. God, Kay said gives her a proper perspective. Before she had nothing to do with him; however, now she has things in proper perspective by putting him first in her life. She further acknowledges that her very confidence for coaching comes from God. She realizes she can do nothing on her own without his help.

During her bout with cancer, her mother's battle with cancer, and her losing season last year, she has referred to the Bible for strength. She keeps one thing clear in her mind, "Pain is inevitable and misery is optional. We make the choice." She is able to do this by keeping God at the center of her life.

Mrs. Yow spoke on the real purpose in life, which is an old question asked by many. "If you have wealth, looks, money or basketball at the center of your life, then you can lose it. However, if you have Christ at the center than you can never lose, because he is the only thing that is stable."

Truly one terrific lady Mrs. Yow indeed gave an inspiring speech. Even after her talk she was open to discussions with the audience. Many of the people thanked Joy for her persistence in bringing Kay Yow here. Joy felt that Kay would be inspirational to whomever heard her. As it

I asked Joy just what FCA's purpose was on campus. She said, "It presents coaches and athletes the challenge of receiving Jesus Christ as their Lord and Saviour and it allows them to work together." To be involved you don't have to be an athlete.

They urge people to come out to Trask in room 142 at 8:30 on Tuesday nights.

If you missed Kay Yow the first time you can see and hear her again April 20, at 7:30 in Cameron Hall auditorium.

Hawks Dust Off Indians, Await Pirates

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Not even the horrid weather can dampen UNCW's baseball team. The Seahawks swept their second three game series this week by defeating CAA foe William and Mary, 8-6, 12-6, 11-5 and the rained soaked fields 3-0.

The Hawks relied on the bats of Tim Hooks, Al Catucci, and Perry Currin to overcome early deficits to the Tribe in double header action on Saturday.

Starting pitcher Tommie Adams was shelled in the early going as William and Mary built a 2-0 and 6-2 advantage thru the first 4 1/2 innings of play. It was time to play long ball. Both Catucci and Currin homered and Mark Chamberlin slapped a two RBI's double into right as the Hawks began to come to life.

When the Tribe finally retired the side, the Hawks had bombarded relief pitcher Tom Colran, who relieved starter Eddy Manning in the second, for five runs. The team added another insurance run in the bottom of the sixth on a Catucci's single that sent Tom Heitter in from second.

Adams held the Tribe scoreless the rest of the contest and claimed his six win of the season. He is 6-2 overall. William and Mary starter, Eddy Manning, is still looking for his first win of the season in four starts. "The condition were tough. It was a slick as glass out there," remarked a concern Bobby Guthrie.

In a game two the Hawks once again spotted the Tribe a generous lead. The tribe struck for four runs on four hits as they almost batted for the cycle. Starter Dave Morrison was shaky in the early innings as Adams was in game one.

"They (Adams and Morrison) weren't hitting their location in the beginning. I told Dave after the first inning; you got to be under control. He took a deep breath and pitch fine the rest of the game," said catcher Al Catucci.

Meanwhile, the Hawks were mounting another comeback.

They struck for one run in the bottom of the second before opening the floodgates.

William and Mary pitcher David Eskay got things going when he gave up a bases loaded walk. This was followed by a sacrifice fly by Tom Heitter bringing in the second run. A double by Tim Hooks brought in two more runs as the Hawks took their first lead 5-4.

"I felt very good tonight and was relieved to have some balls fall in for me tonight," said Hooks. Perry Currin's RBI single ended the scoring at 6-4 for the inning but the Hawks were far from being finished.

Hawks slide by to score another run

After giving up a run to the Tribe in the top of the fourth on a three base error and a sacrifice fly; the Hawks erupted again for more runs to extend their narrow 6-5 lead. Catucci lead off with a double to left and ended up scoring on consecutive singles by Joe Catalano and Trent Morgan.

A fielder's choice on an Ed Stoudemire's grounder sent Catalano home. The Tribe wouldn't let yet as they scratched out another run on two singles and a fielder's choice. This left the score at 8-6 in the favor of the Hawks going into the bottom of the sixth. "William and Mary was as fired up for this series as any team I've seen. We couldn't seem to knock them out," said Coach Guthrie.

Tim Hooks and Ed Stoudemire accounted for the final 12-6 tally as they both hit one and two RBI's singles. Dave Morrison claimed his fourth win of the season upon his mark to 4-1. David Eskay took the loss.

The final game of the series saw the Hawks reverse roles with the Tribe. It was the Hawks that grabbed an early 3-0 lead on Tom Heitter's two run single and Mark Chamberlin's RBI triple. Tim Hook's hot bat account for a run in the first and two in the six in which the Hawks scored six unearned runs on four Tribe errors.

This built a commanding 10-1 lead that William and Mary couldn't overcome and bowed to the Seahawks 11-5. Tony Tillman, who replaced the injured Jerome Hunt, recorded his first win. This raised his mark to 1-3.

Hunt sore ligaments in his elbow in the JMU's series will be gone for the season for the Hawks. He is being flown down to see the Atlanta Braves trainer. He will probably have to undergo surgery in the off-season. He was 5-1 as a starter and will be sorely missed. "It hurts alot to lose Jerome now," said Coach Guthrie.

The Seahawks are undefeated in CAA play but will put that all on the line when they face arch-rival ECU this weekend in a three game series in Greenville. The Purple Pirates are just one game back of the Hawks in the standings. The Hawks are 12-0 in the conference and 19-9 on the year.

Twinwood Incident Rocks UNCW Campus

BY BRUCE FOLEY
STAFF WRITER

What was considered the largest party of the year at the Twinwood duplexes ended in tragedy when a single shot rang out, leaving Kurt Lindstrom, a UNCW sophomore, paralyzed.

The incident occurred Saturday night when several small parties merged to form a single party of over 200 people. Freshman Denise Faliwoda commented, "parties at Twinwood aren't usually as big as Saturday night's; usually the cops come and bust up the crowds."

At approximately 12:30 a.m., a black car was reported to have entered the Twinwood complex, with a woman standing through the sunroof, shining a bright flashlight into the masses.

"Immediately students thought it was a cop car and began to scatter; many dumped their beers," said sophomore Bob Mack.

When it became apparent that the approaching car was not the police, the crowd moved back into the street. Reports indicate that the car continued through the crowd at a speed of about 15 mph, actually bumping a few students. "The car was really traveling tremendously fast for there to be so many people in the road, a lot of people actually had to jump out of the way," said Mack.

At this point, angry partygoers began throwing bottles and cans at the car. The driver of the car responded by firing into the crowd as it pulled out of Twinwood, hitting Lindstrom in the neck.

"There was so much confusion going on when we found Kurt lying on the ground. At first we thought that he had passed out, then later that he had been hit in the head with bottle. A crowd had surrounded him and no one was cooperating," recalled Mack.

Fortunately, Jay Harris a volunteer fireman for the Hampstead Fire Dept and UNCW student was present to administer first aid while the paramedics were sent for.

At present, Lindstrom is in the critical care unit of the New Hanover Memorial hospital.

"When they first brought him in, he was listed as

Parents Contribute $32,000 to UNCW

KAREN FOYE

Were your parents two of the many who "bought UNCW a cup of coffee" and helped the Parents Program raise over $32,000?

On the evenings of April 9-13 student organizations volunteered their efforts in making the first annual Parent Telefund a huge success.

These students were given a script to recite to the parents, asking them to buy UNCW a cup of coffee. After the student caller broke it down to thirty-three cents per day times 365 days, many parents found this deal a hard one to refuse!

Jean Joyner, Coordinator for the Parents and Ambassador programs, estimated that 75% of those persons who contributed during the telefund, bought UNCW a $109.50 cup of coffee.

"Most of the people we contacted bought us a cup of coffee. In return, they get a tangible result, which is a very nice coffee mug," said Howard Lipman, executive director of resource development in the Department of University Advancement.

Jeannie and Bob Renegar, fundraising chairpersons for the parents program and parents of Patrick "Patch" Renegar, a UNCW freshman, were pleased with the success of the first parent telefund. "We are delighted to see the success of the telefund, and feel it has been most successful. For the future, we see even more dollar signs!" said Renegar.

"We were very surprised that we raised over $30,000. We had expected to raise between twenty and twenty-five thousand dollars. All of this money will go to help UNCW students and their parents in many ways," said Lipman.

The Parent Program was designed to serve as an official

Fortieth Commencement May Be Last Of its Kind

BY CELESTE E. BULLEY
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

After the late flights into town and the continental breakfast, UNCW's 40th commencement ceremony Saturday, May 13 will mark the entry into the post college world for 1,155 graduates.

The largest graduating class ever, 1071 undergraduate and 84 graduate students will be receiving their diplomas. "Every year we can say the graduating class is the largest-it's been growing that steadily," said Mimi Cunningham, Director of University Relations.

The commencement address for the ceremony will be given by guest speaker Dr. Roy Carroll, the Vice President for Planning of the University of North Carolina system. Carroll, a native of Arkansas, is a former

This year may be different in at least one major way, for as the school grows, the size of the commencement does also. Tyrone Rowell, Associate Vice Chancellor for University Advancement and Graduation Official said, "One important thing happening this year is this may be the last time we can graduate all at one time."

"We are quickly approaching a time to make the choice between two commencements a year or limiting the number of guests per student who can attend," said Rowell.

This is not the only sign of growth, however. After being finished for only a year, Cameron Hall has already been outgrown by her graduating class of nearly 350. After the actual ceremony in Trask, which lasts from 10 a.m.-12 noon the business school graduates will file into

His current duties with the University of North Carolina include planning for the 16-campus system the collection, analysis and dissemination of information on higher education in NC; preparation of special planning studies and long-range plans; new academic program development and review and evaluation of existing programs within the University.

As another part of the ceremony this year, two awards will be given. One, the Alumni Award, is presented to the senior with the highest GPA. The students having 4.0's get it, with several recipients sometimes, Rowell said. The other, the Hoggard Medal, is received by one senior alone, the senior who has shown the greatest improvement since his or her freshman year.

The rest of the individual schools award diplomas in specific reception areas in the building which houses their department. In regard to this Rowell said, "the graduates need to realize that the money they pay in graduation fees does not go into another University piece of pie." The $27 graduation fee covers those receptions, the printing of the program, renting chairs and labor, renting police to direct traffic, cap, gown and diploma, flowers and the rescue squad, which has been used two out of three years, according to Rowell.

"We even have a reception for [Fall/Winter] graduates," he said. Last year out of 970 graduates, 700 marched, while

Census Bureau Offers Summer Jobs to Students

(NEWS RELEASE)--The U.S. Census Bureau's Charlotte Region has summer job openings for college students in the Carolinas, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky and the District of Columbia.

The Census Bureau hopes college students looking for summer work can help fill the need for about 3,800 temporary employees throughout the region this spring and summer.

Students would help develop a master list containing the addresses for each of the region's estimated 10.5 million households. Since Census Bureau policy is to hire persons indigenous to an area, students would be able to work in their own home towns.

This May in urban areas and June in rural areas, students and other temporary Census employees will drive or walk the streets and roads of their communities checking for a correct mailing address for each housing unit. A census questionnaire will be delivered to each address during March 1990. They are to be completed and mailed back beginning April 1, 1990, Census Day.

These jobs usually last from 6 to 9 weeks and pay $5.50 to $6.00 an hour, depending on the area. Access to dependable transportation is necessary and auto mileage will be reimbursed at a rate of 22.5 cents per mile.

Applicants will be given a short written test, and those hired must take an oath of confidentiality.

"This is a job that provides college students with a meaningful way to spend the summer earning money," Census Bureau Regional director William F. Hill said.

"It's an opportunity for a student to help his or her community and learn first-hand how our nation takes its social and economic pulse every 10 years."

Students interested in applying for the summer jobs should contact the state employment office nearest their home.

Outstanding Cadets Honored

(NEWS RELEASE)--An Awards Ceremony was held this week to recognize outstanding Reserve Officers' Training Corps cadets at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington.

Cadets from each of the military science classes were recognized for academic, athletic, leadership, and military science excellence. The ceremony was held in the Cameron School of Business Auditorium.

Guest speaker for the ceremony was Mr. Tyrone Rowell, Vice Chancellor for University Advancement at UNCW.

Mr. Rowell, a Master Sergeant in the United States Army Reserve, addressed the cadets on their role as future Army officers and the importance of the non-commissioned officer in today's Army. Mr. Rowell, who has been involved with the ROTC program at UNCW since its beginning in 1981, emphasized to the cadets the importance they play in the continued growth of the program.

Local civic and veterans organizations played an important part in this year's ceremony.

Mrs. Harriet James presented the Daughters of the American Revolution Award to cadet James Wilson. LTC (Ret) Tom Walter presented The Retired Officers Association Award to Cadet Susan Jarvis. Mr. Pat O'Donnell, presented American Legion Military Excellence Awards to Cadets Matt Sabel and Greg Toussaint. Mr. Fred Crane presented the American Legion Scholastic Excellence Award to Cadet Stephen Maxner and David Thompson. Mr. Sidney Enten, Commander of American Legion Post 10, presented the American Legion School Award to Cadet Shannon Morris. Mr. Charles Davies presented the Sons of the American Revolution Award to Cadet Bruce Dale. LTC (Ret) William Jones presented the National Sojourners Award to Cadet Cliff Wilkins. Dr. Larry Cabel presented the Association of the United States Army History Award to Cadet Craig Moore. Dr. Jo Ann Seiple presented the Dean's List Awards to Cadets Celeste Sullivan, Barnett Gibbs, Darren Cox, Dallas Kinlaw, Craig Moore, David Thompson, and Stephen Maxner.

The achievements of this year's cadets further establish the proud history of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps program at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. The academic and leadership standards set by this year's cadets point to a bright future for the future officer leadership of the United States Army.

Minority Awards to be Held

(UNCW NEWS)--The Fourth Annual Awards Program for Minority Students will take place at 8 p.m., Tuesday, April 25 in Room 100 of the UU at UNCW. The event is sponsored by the Office of Minority Affairs.

The purpose of the annual ceremony is to recognize African-American UNCW students who have excelled in academics and leadership. The ceremony also serves to inspire other minority students to reach for a higher level of achievement in all aspects of their lives.

There will be 22 leadership and 85 academic awards presented to qualified black students. For the academic award, a student must pass 12 semester hours and have a grade point average of 3.0 for the Spring and Fall 1988 semesters.

C. Wayne Dunlap, a graduate of UNCW and the university's first black SGA president, will be the guest speaker at the event. Dunlap is a manager of advertising and sales promotion for Miles, Inc., Pharmaceutical Division, Westhaven, Ct.

Dr. Roy Carroll,
Commencement '89 Speaker

Cynthia and Rudy Tyson, also graduates of UNCW, will perform a special music presentation. A reception will follow the program. The public is invited to attend. For more information, call Ralph Parker at 395-3832 or 395-3439.

Humanities Grant Awarded

(UNCW NEWS)--The National Endowment for the Humanities has awarded UNCW a grant of $105,051 to fund faculty and curriculum development in the area of "Science, the Humanities and Society."

When matched by the university's contribution of $145,868, the project will involve a total commitment of $250,919 to fund two years of seminars, faculty release time and summer stipends to improve existing courses or develop new ones, and provide guest lecturers and library materials.

The grant will cover the time period from April 1, 1989, to May 31, 1991.

"The project will use the perspective of the humanities to examine the complex relationship between science and modern society," explained Dr. William Schneider, professor of history at UNCW and project director. "The results will be applied by faculty to the improvement of existing courses and development of new ones. This will be part of a 'science and society' curriculum for students to take in conjunction with their departmental major requirements."

This grant is particularly significant to UNCW faculty because, presently, there are limited resources available to finance the enhancement of faculty knowledge or provide faculty with the time off to conduct new course development.

Activities already scheduled include a faculty development seminar May 22-June 9, 1989, which will bring to campus three distinguished visiting scholars in the fields of history, philosophy and literature of science. Faculty attending the seminar will receive a $2,200 stipend.

Also on tap are two guest lecture series during academic years 89-90 and 90-91 devoted to topics which will examine science in its broader social context.

"This program should have a significant impact on the university's curriculum, particularly in terms of encouraging interdisciplinary studies. It will be good for our science students who need to know more about other topics."

Through this program, they can match the technical information with writing and research background. Also, one of the best ways to reach science is by discussing its impact on how we live," said Schneider.

UNCW had expected only 500. "We expect roughly 60% to come back, but got more," Rowell said. "It is again becoming fashionable to march."
These growth indicators please many, but eventually the Chancellor will have to choose which way will best accommodate the graduates. "It's tough to make that choice," said Rowell. "We'll gain and lose whichever we choose."

"It represents our growth, but you leave something behind when you do this, when you make this choice."

Phi Kappa Phi Initiations Held

PATRICIA BRAZELL
STAFF WRITER

Dr. Eric Bolen, who presented the address at the tenth annual Phi Kappa Phi initiation ceremony Thursday, designated the new members as "butresses at an ivy cathedral."

Blanks used this expression as a metaphor describing the educational system as being held together by high achievement.

Twenty-eight students from different academic fields were inducted into the honor society, a 10-year-old chapter at UNCW.

According to Dr. Carole K. Fink, president of the UNCW chapter of Phi Kappa Phi, these students were chosen on the basis of superior scholarship and good character.

Dr. Eric Bolen, Dean of the UNCW graduate school and professor of biological sciences, was the sole faculty member inducted.

Bolen's speech stressed the need for sciences and humanities in the college educational system, which he said isn't providing the fundamentals currently. He suggested a "change in vision and landscape" with training in the humanities. Bolen also cited statistics that showed a decline in liberal arts majors in the past 20 years.

Bolen encouraged professors to do research "to enrich classroom experience, give new ideas, rigor, logic, and clarity of thought without intellectual darkness."

"A stronger faculty and enlightenment for students is the result of a humanities and science interaction in an educational system," said Bolen.

Bolen commended the students, saying they have "established a record of excellence and a crucible that is not always user-friendly."

After the certificates were awarded, Fink informed the new inductees that they would receive a monthly newsletter and would remain a lifetime active member as long as the dues are kept up.

The new inductees closed the program by repeating the motto of Phi Kappa Phi Honor Society, "Let the love of learning rule mankind."

Blanks Named NC Distinguished Woman

BY CAROL TREMBLAY
STAFF WRITER

Dr. Deillah Blanks is truly a woman of achievement. As a recipient of the most recent Distinguished Women of North Carolina award, Blanks is dedicated to education and politics with a particular interest in motivating minorities to enrich their lives through education.

Dr. Blanks, a professor of Social Work at UNCW, received the award in March from the North Carolina Council on the Status of Women. Governor Jim Martin presented the award to Blanks and four other women during the ceremony.

The award is based on the accomplishments and merit of the individual. Blanks received the award for her work with various political endeavors and her ongoing educational interests.

In order for a woman to be eligible for this recognition, she must first be nominated by someone other than herself and submit documentation to a selection committee for review.

When Cohen Stanley, a retired Community Services Director asked for permission to nominate Blanks, she replied in surprise. She felt she was not qualified for this honor.

"I was chosen above women with great accomplishments...very competitive, highly qualified women," says Blanks.

Previous recipients of this award include Senator Helen Marvin and the Honorable Elizabeth Dole.

Armed with a Masters degree in Community Organization and Planning, Dr. Blanks is prepared to make a powerful statement in any of her many pursuits.

Dr. Blanks assists with a variety of programs devoted to helping the less fortunate. Her past ventures include work on the Sinclair Community Action Program and the Community Cany in Columbus County.

She was the Chairman of the Bladen County Democratic Party and chosen as one of the outstanding Black Americans in the 1983-84 Who's Who for achievement in education and community services.

She was also elected as the first woman on the Board of Commissioners in Bladen County. Dr. Blanks is content with this position because she can bring the so-called 'feminine view; into certain issues.

"Men tend not to take some of these issues seriously," says Blanks, "so now they can get a little more attention."

The issues she is concerned with are day care, welfare, the elderly, and minority issues.

Dr. Blanks has worked extensively with young people as well as the elderly in Medicare programs and drop-out deterrence. She blames most of these problems on poverty and the lack of education.

"I see poverty as our greatest enemy," said Blanks sadly. She feels the greatest contributors of generational poverty are unemployment and an unmanageable family size.

Blanks can identify with these people. Being brought up in a poor environment, she can understand their misfortune and disparity.

Optimistically, she adds, "America is one country where the poverty cycle can be broken."

Blanks feels that the present operative system in congress is easily abused by welfare recipients. Through intervention, Dr. Blanks would like to educate these people on the opportunities that are open to them and the importance of higher learning.

Although she has met some major challenges in the past, Dr. Blanks is not likely to retire her services. As long as there is a breath left in her body.

EAP Assists UNCW Staff

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

The UNCW Employees' Assistance Program (EAP), which went into effect April 1, is a confidential counseling service provided by the State Employees' Assistance Program Office of State Personnel.

The primary goal of EAP is to assist UNCW staff employees handle personal problems, particularly when they might interfere with work. UNCW staff personnel are greatly encouraged to use this program.

Bill Calloway, UNCW Director of Personnel, said that "the EAP program was specifically designed to assist staff employees, but faculty will not be denied assistance by any means."

Personal problems that start in the home can interfere with personal work goals, which may eventually affect performance in the work place. These are the times when employees can turn to the EAP.

Assistance is available for both personal and medical problems including: alcohol, family, drug, emotional, financial, legal, physical, and marital problems.

Employees and their family members are encouraged to use the program voluntarily. It is hoped that the service will be by employees before the personal problems affect work performance.

"Since the program went into effect [April 1, 1989], there have been 10 referrals from our campus staff employees, which is a good indication that the program will be successful," said Calloway.

A Self-Referral is when the employee seeks out the assistance. This approach protects the employee's reputation as a valuable member of the work group. All employees are assisted in complete confidence by EAP professionals.

Sometimes, the employees supervisor may notice a drop in work performance, attendance or in work habits and may suggest that the EAP service be used. This is called Supervisory Referral.

Many people and agencies in the community are aware of the program and are willing to help. It is, however, the employee's choice to use the help offered.

Calloway initiated the program at UNCW and has been Director of Personnel at UNCW since 1984. In 1975, when Calloway was working at NC State, he started an Employees' Assistance Program there.

"There are several other UNC system universities that have initiated the program, all of which have been successful," said Calloway. "With UNCW's increasing growth we know the program will be beneficial."

More information may be sought confidentially by calling UNCW's EAP, 395-3162.

will serve as her replacement.

"We all grew really close to her and will miss her badly. She was our Mama Jean Joyner!" agreed the group of 50 Ambassadors.

Joyner feels certain that, although she will miss working with everyone, both programs will survive and continue to produce great things for the university.

"The Ambassador and Parent Programs are no longer in their infancy. They are standing on their own and I'm proud of the direction that they have come. They are both quality programs with quality people," said Joyner.

link between parents, faculty, and the administration of UNCW. These objectives will be accomplished in the form of an annual parent weekend, orientation for the parents of incoming freshmen, a future job-hoeline for graduating students, mailings of newsletters, proud parent decals, UNCW Today, and much more.

The program will also serve as sounding board for the chancellor and administration concerning ideas and issues affecting students and/or parents.

This program is headed by an advisory council that consists of Joyner and twenty-five UNCW parents. It was this group that help organize the telefund.

"The parents council was supportive throughout the whole telefund. They arranged the food and the prizes that were donated nightly; many came from out of town to help. They gave 100% of their support," said Lipman.

The student organizations also dedicated a great deal of their time to the telefund. Those that participated, in hopes of winning the $250.00 prize are: Tau Delta Theta, Sigma Chi Epsilon, Alpha Delta Pi, Alpha Xi Delta, Delta Sigma Phi, Alpha Phi, and Delta Tau Delta.

Tau Delta Theta and Sigma Chi Epsilon split the prize for raising the most money per organization.

"Since we are a new sorority, I'm glad we were able to participate. It gave us a chance to get our name better known - and the prize money won't hurt either," said Andrea Piner, member of Sigma Chi Epsilon.

The UNCW Ambassadors volunteered during the telefund as night captains. They were responsible for keeping the papers in order and cheering for their fellow students.

"I'm glad that I was able to help out with the telefund. I like the way it was set up...selling cups of coffee made it a lot more fun than just asking for their money," said Linda Pomerantz.

Pomerantz and other Ambassadors wanted the telefund to be a tribute to their advisor, Jean Joyner.

In order to plan for her upcoming wedding, graduation, other events, Joyner has resigned from the university as coordinator of parent and Ambassador programs. Lipman

Editorials

Out Of The Oven
And Into The Fire

All of Wilmington has read the last few issues of the Star News and thinks UNCW is to blame for everything that happened on the night Kurt Lindstrom was shot. That is not a just or well-educated assumption.

Yes, when a student leaves for college, they should be fully prepared to be responsible for their own actions, but it simply is not the duty of the school attended to provide moral or ethical reinforcement for, in UNCW's case, 6800 students who feel themselves to be adults.

What happened last Friday night at Twinwood was more than tragic, yet no more the fault of the administration than of Kurt Lindstrom.

So, UNCW students if you normally care only about yourself, you had better be willing to stand up for UNCW now, as the backlash from the community descends.

The community, which has been crying out for greater control of the student population when they are off-campus, is now shaking their heads and saying "Tsk, tsk, tsk...we told you this type of thing would happen."

Oh come off it! There is never an excuse for a person taking shots at people standing in the street, even if they are throwing bottles at your car. Wouldn't the normal citizen call the police at the nearest pay phone and wait for the law to take care of it? Do you think normal, well balanced people drive around with loaded guns accessible in their cars?

Whoever shot Kurt Lindstrom was a person looking for an excuse to shoot. He or she could have just as easily walked into the Scotchman up the street or driven downtown Saturday morning and shot at the parade watchers. Throwing bottles is not adequate provocation for shooting at humans.

It is unseemly to assume that UNCW developing a Nazi state of authority would change the sentiments of local residents, (although it might, because no one would opt for school here.) Why is it we get the feeling everyone's happy with the money we put into local economy, but disgruntled with what comes with the territory?

There are no grounds for taking double disciplinary action when a student is arrested unless he or she truly constitutes a threat to the university, which the weekend partiers do not tend to be. And surely the students are grateful for this, if they are conscious of how very different it could be. But what we students need now is to be grateful enough of how good we have it to be more responsible when street partying, or partying wherever.

If the citizens really want to lay blame, they can lay it in their own backyards, for allowing the drinking age to go down, and forcing the parties out of controlled environments like bars and on-campus areas into the streets. Those with foresight recognized at the time that students would still drink. But when nearly all students were of the legal drinking age, UNCW could and did have more control over them for students didn't have to converge in the street; they stayed on campus.

Someone could have been innovative enough to do what Louisiana did: retain the drinking age of 18 and tax the alcohol to the sky to make up the difference. It's too late to go back now.

So damn yourselves, Wilmington, when wanting to find fault with UNCW students and administration; we appreciate their fairness, and will not take the blame alone for the bullet lodged in Kurt Lindstrom's neck--you are as much to blame as we.

Corrections

In last week's Seahawk the headline for the story concerning the chancellor incorrectly identified his condition as "critical." It is true that he had been listed in critical condition and that a nurse at the hospital had informed us that his condition was indeed such, but by the time the paper was printed his condition had been upgraded to serious. We apologize for the error.

And in the article about Greek Week in the April 13 issue, it was incorrectly stated that Kappa Alpha and another group tied for first in the scavenger hunt. Delta Zeta actually came in first with 19 points. Sorry!

Thirty-Three Down, None To Go

After thirty-three consecutive newspapers, my time writing columns has come to an end. I'll be the first to admit that column writing is not my forte, but I do get some interesting verbal responses from my friends on the occasional columns that I do write.

One of the most interesting incidents occurred the time I wrote about trying to get rid of the Miranda rights. After that issue came out, I heard from at least ten people about some professor raising hell about the column, he even (so I heard) called using Reader's Digest pseudo-journalism.

I neglected to say that the article I used as a source had been picked up by Reader's Digest and was written by a lawyer who was tired of seeing blatantly guilty criminals go free on technicalities. At any rate, this Professor who had been dragging my name through the mud in his classes never wrote in, but word of mouth travels fast around here.

Several incidences involving "racism" erupted throughout the year causing quite a bit of adverse publicity. Racism is never good in any form and to eradicate it from society would be a blessing indeed. Currently, it seems that the non-funding of the UNCW Gospel Choir, as decided by an SGA vote of 9 to 7, may erupt into an issue involving race, but hopefully it will be understood that this is an issue of religion and not race. However this issue is resolved I have high hopes that it will not turn into an ugly racist scene...good luck SGA.

Now I would like to address one last issue. I would like everyone that reads this to try something. Move your fingers or wiggle your toes for a second. Look at your hand and feel the warmth of the sunshine or coldness of a cool drink. Now that you have, think about one of your fellow students who may never have that sensation again.

Kurt Lindstrom was at Twinwood last Saturday night. There was nothing especially different from any other Twinwood party that almost every student, including myself, has attended at one time or another. He was just having fun, then he was shot. He wasn't singled out for any particular reason, he just happened to be in the right place at the wrong time. For those of you who were there, it could have easily been any one of you.

What makes this even more interesting is the fact that at least 200 people were there and that many of them were within fifteen feet of the car from which the shot was fired. Yet with all these people present at the scene of a shooting that has paralyzed a nineteen year old sophomore, one has to wonder why this car that drove through the partygoers has not yet been identified, nor has an arrest been made.

If you or anyone you know has any information about this shooting that you feel will aid the police in finding those responsible for it, please call the police. You can't change what happened to Kurt Lindstrom, but you can make it possible for someone to pay for this ridiculous shooting.

This incident at Twinwood has also brought the University under heavy fire from residents about the controlling of UNCW students by the administration. Even the Star News has written an editorial addressing the issue. Some even feel that the University should be able to control these large parties.

I personally feel that the residents need to wake up a little. If one is to assume that what a UNCW student does off-campus should be controlled by the administration should not one also assume that the city of Wilmington should be responsible for its citizens if and when they leave the city limits. If you really care about your campus and the reputation it has, take a look around. Would you like to have a degree from a school with a reputation as a campus full of crazed party-happy barbarians or would you like to graduate from a school with a reputation that carries respect, one that people in the corporate world will look at in a positive light?

And last, congratulations to all the seniors who are about to ditch collegiate life for a shot at the real world. There was a line from the movie "Back To School" that Rodney Dangerfield said in a college graduation scene that went, "My advice to you is go back home and live with your parents. It's murder out there; let them worry about it." Good Luck!

P.S. Aspire, Persevere and Indulge Not!
P.S.S. Cheers "Home Boys", to the end of an era!

Take A Look Back And Think

This time of the school year gets me started thinking about "endings."

For some of you, your college career is ending and you are going to graduate school or have a job lined up. Other of you seniors have not found a job in your field yet. Still others of you are graduating and don't have the foggiest idea what you want to do with your life. Many, are just looking forward to the end of the semester and the end of exams. You need a break and the summer looks inviting.

On a more extreme level, where with our two young men are in intensive care in the hospital, whose future has been radically interrupted, one by a car accident and one by a gun shot. One form of life as they and their friends and family have known, has come to an end and the future is very much shrouded in mystery and darkness.

I want to call these "endings" to your attention because there is an art to the process of bringing closure to any dimension of our life experience, whether it be the ending of a school year, graduating or the possible loss of life.

The process begins by taking some time to reflect on the experience that is coming to a close and sitting back and remembering the various dimensions of this past year or the past 4 years or whatever.

It is time to celebrate friends and accomplishments and failures survived. It is time to reflect on how we have grown during this year. Have you accomplished what you set out to do? Do you like the person you have become? How do you feel about the way you have handled the difficulties that have come your way this past year.

It is also a time look into the future. What are your dreams? If you could do what you wanted to do, what would that really be?

It is also a time for appreciating the people you are leaving. This might be a good time to think about those who you care for deeply and find some way to say or express your love and appreciation. If someone has touched your life in a way that left you a better person, let them know that.

The goal worth working for in dealing with your "endings" is to leave as little unfinished business as possible by saying good-bye, expressing our appreciation in dealing with everything from unpaid parking tickets to notes of appreciation, to housekeeping staff in the residence halls.

Again, it takes some reflection on what has happened to us and who has been a part of it that we appreciate. I hope you will take such time and say and do those things that will mean a lot to the people you appreciate.

Life has a way of rolling on and on but the transitions that we experience can be enriched if we undertake those things that will leave us with a sense of completion and closure.

Tips On Entering The Job Market

I've never been at a loss for words when it came to writing this column (as you probably know) but I had a tough time deciding what to write in my last column.

At first, I considered writing a recap of all my previous columns, but I thought, "What a wussy idea." I also considered writing about UNCW twenty years from now. You know, UNCW will be renamed "Cameron by the Sea." Your kids will be going there and complaining about the parking problem and the cafeteria food. But I thought, "Nash."

I finally decided to be of some help to those of you who will graduate. Since most of you have aspirations of becoming corporate slaves, I will offer a few ideas on how to impress your prospective masters.

Remember, these masters see thousands of resumes and prospective slaves each year -- you must stand out in the crowd and really kiss some serious butt. They don't want to hear about your 3.4 GPA or that you are a "people person," they want something different!

Here is a sample of what I would give them if I for some odd reason decided to enter the slave market:

Richard J. Cairns Jr.

Career Objectives: To be the best employee that your corporation has ever seen.

Education: 2 years at the University of Texas and 2 years at UNCW as a Speech Communications major, with a B.A. degree. GPA 4.0 I worked 80 hours a week while going to school full time and supporting my family, which includes a brother with Downs Syndrome who has to wear a drool cup under his chin. (I was the only one he allowed to empty it.)

Work Experience: I worked at two urgent-care medical offices where I did everything and was the best employee they ever had. I was in the U.S. Navy for four years where I negotiated several peace agreements with the Russians. It was so secret though, so you can't look it up. I was an Admiral when I decided to leave.

Activities and Interests: Helping underprivileged children and adults. I worked in many "soup lines" and I spent as much time as possible entertaining at nursing homes. I also enjoy doing "The Nasty" as often as possible.

P.S. I don't care about money. I just want to be the best slave, I mean employee that you ever had. My nose is dark brown.

Letters of Recommendation

To Whom It May Concern:

Rick was not only the best looking employee that we ever had, he was also the brightest, most enthusiastic, most honest, and hardest worker that we have ever seen. He only thought of others, never himself. He even wrote a lovely column that reached out to everyone in his school paper. When he wasn't working overtime for free, he would be at the children's hospital or at a nursing home doing volunteer work. We all love him and strive to be like him. The only bad aspect of him working here was that he made everyone else look so mediocre.

Sincerely Yours,
Rick's Administrator
To Whom It May Concern:

I am a physician at the clinic in which Rick was employed. He is without a doubt the best human being that I have ever had the pleasure of knowing. He has forgotten more about medicine than I will ever know. Whenever I'd feel down, I'd look to Rick for an encouraging word or insightful advice, and I'd immediately feel better. I wish he were my brother. I weep when I think of him leaving. (Please excuse the tear stains on this letter.)

Sincerely Yours,
Rick's Boss
Now what employer wouldn't notice those qualifications? Give it a try. It never hurts to "fudge" a little. But seriously, folks, thank you for reading my column each week. Writing it and hearing positive feedback from you has made it the high point of my career at UNCW.

My last words of wisdom: After you graduate, take a close look at your goals in life and what your priorities are. If getting rich and buying material items is your goal--you are wasting your putrid life. Think about what you will be contributing to humankind and to your environment. That is where it's at! Why be like all the other butholes in our society? Make a difference in this world!

Classrooms Used As Bully Pullpits

Support For Crew Team Badly Needed At UNCW

Dear Editor,

I am the current captain of the women's crew team here on campus. Most of the people on campus who will read this have no idea of our existence.

The story of our club is one of both great accomplishment and failure and is well worth some recognition. However, in the more than two years that the UNCW CREW has been in existence, THE SEAHAWK has failed to give us any sort of recognition (despite our efforts to get articles written).

Passing off the UNCW CREW as unimportant may be a mistake that the university will soon regret. Rowing is one of the most rapidly growing sports on the east coast and our team has been actively competing since 1987. This year alone, we have raced against several established rowing clubs/teams such as Duke University, Yale University, Notre Dame University, George Mason University, and University of Pittsburgh. We have also raced against recently formed clubs such as Clemson and Furman

Although we may not have won every race that we entered, we were there to represent our school, and that is most important. Considering that we have no coach to guide us in any way and very little equipment to speak of, we view this as a great accomplishment.

The only failure of our club is that we are not recognized by students and faculty on this campus. Because of the lack of interest and knowledge or our club, this past year has been difficult and frustrating for those of us who are trying to keep crew alive.

Wilmington is the ideal location for a crew team to begin and to grow because of the relatively mild winters, as well as the potential community support. UNCW has the ability to become one of the best rowing teams in the southeast. It is a shame to see such a graceful sport go to waste.

Yet Another @#%!* Parking Story

To the Editor:

Recently, I had to bring a different car back to school. Of course, I had to go through all the fun of getting a new temporary parking tag (sarcasm!). These are those gay looking little things that hang from various rear-view mirrors around campus. You'd swear that they were rejects from the ticket booths at Carowinds.

Anyway, on the week in question, I wasn't back at school until Tuesday night. The parking tag went out of date on Monday the 10th. Since the parking office is closed at night, I was forced to get a renewed tag the next day, Wednesday the 12th. Of course, I have class all day Wednesday so I decide to get the new tag between my 1:00 and 3:00 classes.

At 2:00, I get in my car to go to the parking office to get a new tag. I find a ticket that is marked 1:55. It figures I would make it all Tuesday night only to get a ticket five friggin' minutes before I go to get a new tag. Anyway, I go to the parking office and am informed that I will have to appeal my ticket if I don't wish to pay it.

Everyone knows that the only thing appealing a ticket does is prolong the agony and keep you from registering on time. But, what else could I do? I tell them fine, that I'll appeal it because it's a $15 ticket for not having a valid parking sticker. In the meantime, I'm giving all the vital car information to Officer Powell, who is one of the ones that give out all those lovely little tickets.

After a grueling few moments of rattling off my license tag number, make of

Student Action Team Is Ready To Help

On March 20th, we, the student body, held an election here at UNCW. We voted into office fellow students who we believed would best represent our interests.

It is now our duty to present our suggestions and complaints to the new Senate for consideration. For this very reason, the Student Government has in existence a special Standing Committee. This committee consists of volunteer senators called the Student Action Team (SAT).

Some may know this group by its previous name, "The Student Suggestion Committee," yet few have made an effort to use this very important tool.

This committee takes time to seek out the views and ideas of individual students in an attempt to present the Student Government with a weekly report on the changes in popular interests.

The newly appointed committee chairman, Vernon car, color of car, etc. Officer Powell tells me that she has to leave and go "play in the traffic." Before leaving she tells me to finish filling out the appeals form and give it to the other lady who was there at the time. Thus, I fill in my valid, but probably futile excuse in the space allotted.

With a sign of relief at my completion of the form, and with an irksome attitude of having to appeal the thing in the first place, I leave. As I near my car, which I had parked at the bookstore, I noticed Officer Powell riding off into the sunset on her three-wheeled scooter from hell! As I look at my car, I realize that she has given me yet another @#%!* ticket for not having a valid parking decal. HELLO! IS ANYONE HOME?

It seems to me that I would be able to remember the make, model and license of a car that I had written down not 5 minutes before. All this did was to give me a hemorrhage in my throat as I screamed at the mentality of our parking administration. With blood in my eyes I returned once again to the parking office with ticket in hand. After ranting to the lady who was in the office, she informs me that she will take care of the ticket, and not to worry about it. By then, with my blood pressure way up, it was too late to say "Don't worry."

Even if I'm charged with felonious libel, I feel better just getting it off my chest. I'm sure many other students have faced this "Parking Hell." I hope that this letter lets you know that you're not alone.

-Rodney Ingle

Johnson, feels that the SGA should work with the student body by continually seeking student opinion on issues up for debate. He also believes it to be very important for the Senate to consider different viewpoints and opinions during their decision making process.

By continually stressing the importance of student awareness and involvement through his dedicated staff, Vernon hopes to prove SAT to be the most effective communication channel between the Senate and the student body.

Only with your help can the goals of this organization be met. The Student Action Team would, therefore, like to invite every student interested in expressing their views on current issues and/or ideas for future activities to the next meeting. It will be held Thursday, April 20th, at 3pm, in room #204 of the Student Union.

(Collegiate Times- Peter Collier)—Twenty-five years ago this fall, I was in school at U. C. Berkeley and was helping to organize the Free Speech Movement, one of the opening salvos in the political wars of the '60s.

One afternoon during a lull in the protest, I stood up in the middle of a graduate seminar on James Boswell and began lecturing my professor, more or less out of the blue, on the need for a radical consciousness in the classroom.

After I had finished, my professor said something like this: "Now that's all very interesting, Mr. Collier, and one is certainly left to wonder what Samuel Johnson would have thought of such a demand, given his famous confrontation with John Wilkes. But then you're not exactly a John Wilkes, are you?"

John Wilkes, I should say, was the flaming radical of Samuel Johnson's day, and Johnson, great Tory that he was, found him a charming man but also a threat to civilization. At the time, of course, I identified with Wilkes, and was stung by the suggestion that my radicalism was less than his. It's a measure of how far I've come that I now identify with good old Sam Johnson, who saw the radicals of his day as "unprincipled and destructive scoundrels."

More to the point, it's a measure of how far the university has come that the process I've just described now occurs exactly in reverse.

No longer is it a case of students trying to intrude radical politics into the classroom and being politely rebuffed by professors who take their jobs seriously. Now it's the other way around. University officials make leftist part of the intellectual air student breathe, and professors are using their rooms as bully pulpits from which to force correct political attitudes on the young.

We New Left radicals paid little attention to conservatives back in the early '60s. Our real targets were liberals — Cold War liberals, corporate liberals, and most of all the liberals who formed the vital center in the Democratic Party, and who had been present at the creation of the postwar world. We knew that if we could break their power, we'd change America forever. And we did. This is one of the few undisputed triumphs of the New Left.

But of all the liberal strongholds, the one we attacked with special venom was the university. Why? Because it claimed to sympathize with our frustration, because of its alleged ties to the war machine, because it was the only place we could have an impact, because it was there.

McCarthyism had scarred the university. When I first arrived at Berkeley in 1957, these wounds were still fairly raw. But, the Left's reign of terror in the 1960s affected the university far more than the senator from Wisconsin ever could have. Radicals invaded classrooms and prevented professors from teaching. Radicals assaulted students who didn't agree with them. Radicals set fire to libraries whose offense was to hold the accumulated wisdom of Western civilization. Radicals bombed buildings where work was allegedly being done in support of "American fascism."

Radicals maimed individual lives and, on many campuses, brought the business of education to a standstill. I know, because I was one of them. We changed forever — in a way old Joe McCarthy, with all his delusions of grandeur, never would have thought of doing — what is taught, and how, and why.

We brought the university to its knees and it's remained in that posture ever since.

Yet after Vietnam many of my old comrades reentered the university as professors and administrators. Having failed to change America in their image in the '60s, they used the respite offered by the "Me Decade" to get on the tenure track. In part, they were seeking a convalescent home where they could recover from radical burnout. But they were also acting on the one lesson they had learned from the 1960s. To be effective, they would have to hunker down for the long struggle in a tolerant environment.

I first saw the effects of their decision late in the 1970s, when I was teaching at Berkeley as a visiting writer. By that time, innovations from the '60s such as "ethnic studies" had cheapened the curriculum. By themselves, however, such excrescences on the curriculum would have been self-limiting; most students knew that these courses were trivial and avoided them like the plague.

The problem was, the New Left mentality had deepened into the way the university saw itself and its central academic disciplines. Its proponents were beginning to infect university life with their millennial yearnings, their nihilism, and their academic Dada.

They were demanding that administrators spend time in pursuit of the perfect (and perfectly discriminatory) racial mix, instead of dealing with the growing crisis of undergraduate instruction. They were using the classroom to cultivate ethnic tensions. They were changing the curriculum to break down the "bourgeois" canon. And in all these efforts, they were encountering little resistance.

The transformation of the university that began in the '60s and accelerated during the following decade is now nearly complete. Leftists have created an ambience in which grievance replaces inquiry and polemic masquerades as scholarship; in which the professional organizations originally meant to advance the cause of history, anthropology, and other disciplines have become lobbies for leftist causes and terrorist elites around the world; in which the model administrator is a combination of Saul Alinsky, Mother Theresa, and Neville Chamberlain.

In this atmosphere zealots threaten the university's mission by desperately promoting their chosen truths, while centrists threaten it by denying that there are any truths at all, and by continuing to cede academic territory to those who demand it, to keep them quiet.

By declining to enforce its own principles and standards, the university has hastened its own decline and imperiled our society. It is in crisis not because of racism or financial problems or overcrowding or any of the "crises" one hears about, but because of what Jean-Paul Sartre would have called its own "bad faith."

We need an academic equivalent of the Reagan Doctrine — an effort to roll back the Left's successes in the university. Although the problem was caused by people like myself and my old comrades who are now sitting in Academic Senates across the country, today's students will have to bear the brunt of the struggle. But then, as we radicals used to say in the 1960s, one generation's sin is the next generation's call to duty.

D.C Could Use Renovation, But . . .

Letter to the Editor:

Recently I've received a lot of flack on my article denoting Washington DC. I am writing now to former students with all the angry students who seem to disagree with me.

First of all, if the angry students had read further into my article, they would have found that there were parts of DC that I found very attractive. There are hidden vistas of elegance here and there.

Unfortunately, I happened to DC visit during a mobbed, traffic-stopping, accident-infested holiday where multiple events gave off a nasty aura for the entire city.

For those who worship Washington in all its glory, I apologize for your frustration. Maybe a trip during a summer day during a less busy time will enlighten my previous view.

Perhaps my opinion was a hostile reaction to the years of abuse from northern relatives and friends calling Wilmington and every other town south of the Mason Dixon Line, "cow country."

My main point is that there are parts of DC that could use some major renovation. There is also a lot of unappreciated beauty in Wilmington that goes continuously unnoticed.

A subjective point of view: is only a personal account of an issue, not necessarily carved in stone for everyone to agree with. Mine, is certainly no exception.

I really didn't mean to start any major student upheaval. It was only an opinion based on a disappointing weekend.

Law Schools Experience Application Overload

BY JAKE GAFFIGAN

(CPS) -- An unprecedented number of college seniors are trying to get into law school, various campuses report.

While no national numbers are available so soon after the April 1 deadline, many schools impose for applications, individual law school admissions officers almost without exception say they've received far more applications for the 1989-90 school year than for other years within memory.

"We've had a 40 percent increase over last year," said John Friesman, admissions director for the University of Vermont's law school, "and last year we had a 22 percent increase over the previous year."

At Drake University Law School Dean David Walker reported the number of applications has increased 60 percent over the number he got last spring.

Nationwide, 18.5 percent more students took the Law School Admissions Test this year than in 1987-88, the Law School Admissions Service (LSAS) said.

The boom, moreover, comes after a 12-year decline in the number of students wanting to go on to law school, noted LSAS spokesman Bill Kinnish.

He attributes it to a number of factors, not the least of which is the popularity of the "L.A. Law" television show.

"The first factor contributing to the boom is image," Kinnish said. "There was a lot of publicity, bad press and articles about the glut of lawyers during the decline. Now we have 'L.A. Law' and other activities that brought the law to the forefront."

Kinnish isn't the only law school admissions director to thank "L.A. Law" for students' increased interest in the field.

"That's an impression that various admissions officers have stated, but it's unsubstantiated," observed Ted Hulbert of the University of California at Los Angeles' law school, which is wading through a record 5,607 applications for 325 openings in next fall's first-year law class.

Mary Upton, admissions director at the Washington College of Law at American University in Washington, D.C., also thinks tv might have inspired some seniors to consider a law career, although she cites a different show.

"Washington is a very hot place to study law since the Iran-Contra hearings," Upton contended.

Upton and others quickly add students seem to be responding to influences more substantial than mere images, too.

Kinnish, for one, said many students mention how lucrative law can be as their motive for applying to law school.

Students, Kinnish said, "spend a lot of money over their three years of law school, and they have to expect that their will be economic opportunities at the end of those three years."

Some top law firms in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles start some new lawyers at as much as $75,000 a year.

Kinnish and Upton both speculated some students who in the past may have gone to med school are opting for law school instead. "You can bootstrap a law profession a lot easier than a medical profession," Kinnish said.

Students may be applying to law schools in greater numbers than in past years not because they plan to practice law as a career, but because it "can act as an entre into other professions," Kinnish added.

The boom, however, can strain law schools' ability to teach more students.

Vermont, which like many schools accepts more students than it can handle because it assumes some of them ultimately will enroll elsewhere, severely overtaxed its resources when it found itself with 30 more students than it could handle in its 1989-90, but the number of applications rose anyway.

"The harder it is to get in," noted Drake's Walker, "the more people want to come here."

Walker said students seem to rely on image for which school, as well as which profession, to choose. Many students, he explained, equate a school's quality with its entrance requirements. Though schools that are hard to get into aren't always good academically, Walker said raising admissions standards nearly always raises demand for the school.

"We've quite consciously taken advantage of the surge by being more selective," he reported.

Great Image: Actors Larry Drake (l), Harry Hamlin (r) and the rest of the "L.A. Law" ensemble may have helped prompt a huge flood of law school applications this spring, some law deans say.

Kinko's Faces Lawsuits

(CPS) -- A group representing the biggest book companies in the country threatened in early April that it may sue Kinko's, the nationwide chain of photocopying centers, for its practice of helping teachers engage in "professor publishing."

The Association of American Publishers (AAP), based in Washington, D.C., said the practice -- in which professors photocopy and bind together materials to supplement or in some cases replace textbook -- violates copyright laws.

Professors claim the practice also can save students from having to buy lots of textbooks.

Under the "fair use" provision of copyright law, professors need permission to copy everything, unless they can pass a litmus test for brevity, spontaneity and "cumulative effect" of the copying on the course. It's up to Kintoss, the AAP says, to make sure they can pass the test.

"We have no comment on whether or not there will be a lawsuit," said A A P spokeswoman Virginia Antos.

"We're not saying anything more or less."

Kinko's representatives also declined comment.

The publishers' group in 1982 won an out-of-court settlement in a case that charged nine New York University professors of illegal photocopying practices. NYU professors now need written proof that they have publishers' permission to make Kinko's has more than 400 stores, most serving college campuses.

Disabled Face Unique Obstacles

(CPS) A Florida Atlantic University freshman who has cerebral palsy will be forced to move out of his dorm this summer if he can't find a roommate to help him bathe, feed and clothe himself.

Fred Nisen says he has placed ads "all over campus" with no luck. His present roommate, Douglas "Dutch" Mann, is graduating this spring. Nisen's companion would get free room and board, but apparently that hasn't been enough to lure qualified students.

"It's not a lot of work, but it's enough to keep most students away," said Dee Davis, director of FAU's Disabled Student Services.

"There are people willing to do the job, but they can't get accepted into school," Davis said. Several FAU women nursing students also are interested, but housing regulations forbid "cohabitation."

But if one else volunteers, Davis said, she will push the administration for an exception to the cohabitation rule. "Let's face it. It would be a hell of a praxicum."

If Nisen can't find a roommate, he will have to move back in with his parents, which says Davis, is the "worst possibility" because of the tremendous amount of time and money that would be required.

Disabled students at other campuses also are encountering obstacles.

There's been a "shocking erosion" in school services nation wide of handicapped and disadvantaged students, Mary Hatwood Furell of the National Education Association (NEA) said at a Washington, D.C., press conference April 4.

Furell called for $10 billion in new federal spending for school services for the handicapped, bilingual education and for Pell Grants for college students.

At North Carolina State University, two student groups plan to blockade a pedestrian tunnel during exam week the end of April to protest the lack of a handicapped-accessible tunnel.

Protestors have given the university until April 20 to announce a construction date that would provide at least one wheelchair accessible tunnel by the 1990-91 school year.

In a letter to the protest organizers, NCSU Chancellor Bruce Poulton said, "I am committed to work toward a barrier-free campus as budgetary guidelines permit."

AIDS Numbers To Grow Rapidly In College Scene

(CPS) "Significant numbers" of college students will be suffering from AIDS in the 1990's, the head of the American Health Association's AIDS task force told a health conference in Seattle the first week in April.

"This is not a potential problem on campuses," Dr. Richard Keeling, who also heads the University of Virginia's health services department, told a regional meeting of doctors, nurses and hospital administrators in Seattle. "It's an established problem."

About three out of every 1,000 collegians carry the HIV virus, which causes AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome), a preliminary Centers for Disease Control report estimated last fall.

AIDS is a fatal disease that breaks down the body's immune system. It is often spread through certain kinds of sexual contacts. Health experts have long considered college students, who generally are sexually more promiscuous than other people, as running a high risk of contracting the disease.

"Most students now have a fairly good base of information about AIDS," he said. "We need to facilitate links between what they know and what they do."

Keeling thought most of the students now infected won't begin to suffer AIDS symptoms until the early 1990's because the virus takes that long to destroy the immune system.

At that point, Keeling expects campus health services to be overwhelmed. "We're still in the infancy of providing the range of medical and psychological services" needed to treat AIDS patients.

Animal Liberation Front Goofs Again In Ariz.

(CPS) Animal liberationist "freed" more than 1,000 University of Arizona research animals in a lab raid April 3, but in the process may have released some mice carrying a contagious disease.

The Animal Liberation Front claimed responsibility for the raid, which included two arson fires that caused an estimated $10,000 worth of damage, in a statement left with Tucson police soon after the blaze.

ALF members conducted the raid, the note said, to save the animals "from certain torture and death."

Thirty of the mice, however, were infected with a "Third World system illnesses.

"I don't know how (the research mice) can ever be recovered," Sterling said, unless ALF members have kept them and would return them.

A month earlier, two dogs were stolen from a Virginia Tech veterinary medicine class, an "Disease" by veterinary science Prof. Charles Sterling, who had been tracking the disease's behavior.

Sterling said the disease -- caused by a bacterium called cryptosporidium -- causes severe diarrhea for two-to-four weeks, and can be fatal to people with immune anonymous caller told the Collegiate Times, the student paper.

The caller explained vet students were to perform surgery on the dogs -- which would eventually be destroyed -- as part of their class project, but that the students grew attached to them and stole them before they were harmed.

Such experiments may become unnecessary if Auburn University veterinary medicine Prof. Charles Branch succeeds in a project, announced in March, to develop video disks to teach students surgery they learn now by using live animals.

Spring Break: Left High And Dry

(CPS) -- Two more travel agencies may wind up in court for turning student spring break trips into nightmares.

University of Toronto students may sue Inter-campus Programs of Chicago, charging the company stranded them in Jacksonville, Fla.

And 177 Detroit high school students say Skyworld International, a local travel agency, never showed up to take them to Florida for break, despite taking a total of $69,915 from them.

Skyworld officials did not return reporters' phoned inquiries about the incident.

While the Detroit students did not get to leave home, the Canadian students were left waiting in Jacksonville for transportation back to campus. They got back with the help of the city's Sheriff's Department, which arranged for other buses to take them.

Inter-campus said the buses they had promised had been delayed by bad weather, but the 80 stranded Toronto students say they'll sue if Canada's Ministry of Tourism recommends it.

Michigan's Attorney General's office has sent Skyworld a "notice of intended action," explained Chris DeWitt of the state's Dept. of Justice. The state may also file a civil suit for damages of up to $25,000.

"We hope to resolve the situation short of filing suit," DeWitt said.

The AG's office will try to recover the $391 paid by each student, "but there's no guarantee that will happen," DeWitt noted.

Neither Skyworld nor Inter-Campus Programs are related to Campus Marketing Inc. (CMI), a Chicago agency under investigation for cancelling the spring break trips of some 400 Ohio State University students, DeWitt and CMI regional representative Jan Berry said.

UNCW PROGRESS

YESTERDAY

Twenty years ago, when UNCW joined the University system, there were three main academic buildings. UNCW is finishing her 42nd school year with eleven academic buildings, three administrative buildings, three student service buildings, six residence halls and a coliseum.

But UNCW has grown at an astonishing rate this year alone, and this section is designed to show some of the progress of twenty years.

This aerial photo of the campus was taken around 1968 shows Hoggard, Alderman and Hinton James. The parking lot is what is now the lot beside Hanover Gym, which had not been constructed yet.

UNCW Has Boom Town Growth For '89

BY CELESTE E. BULLEY
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

The progress UNCW is experiencing is not only what's visible, but also the many things in the planning stages. The biggest changes for the upcoming year we can expect to see are in the completion of the projects currently underway on the east or backside of campus.

The new cafeteria is expected to open in October, and the new apartments should be ready for occupancy this fall, although they are "running a little late" according to Associate Vice Chancellor for Business Affairs J. Carl Dempsey. The renovations on Bear Hall will be done by fall, with prospectively both the old and new wings open for classes. Although the old cafeteria will not be renovated immediately upon the opening of the new, it is a sign of our progress—UNCW will need both to handle the student load comfortably.

One of the biggest additions to come to campus in the coming years will be the University Union Annex. Although not projected to be completed in the coming year, the annex is projected to be completed by 1992. The annex is currently in the stages of being prepared for bidding on the construction.

Before that bidding is opened up, however, a series of event must take place. When an idea in initially conceived, the funds are the first area examined for the feasibility of the project. Then it is decided what features are needed in the new building, and what can be afforded.

up, and gradually revised as the estimators decide what the school cannot afford. "Nothing essential is being cut out," says Dempsey, "only certain amenities."

Before the ground can be

UNCW has one of the most beautiful campuses in the state, and the changes forthcoming symbolize our amazing growth and progress.

In the case of the annex, a four million-plus budget was assigned. Later, the blueprints were drawn broken, the Physical Plant, which is currently in the building adjacent to Lot E (the lot between the Union and the cafeteria), must be moved to a building which is going to go into construction soon behind the Campus Police station. Part of the Physical Plant is already back there, according to Dempsey, and the movement of the remainder of the Plant to that location should not affect traffic patterns in the area, as the road behind the Union should be completed in June.

One very special addition to campus, a landmark, has been designed to occupy part of lot M, the lot beside the Union and Friday Hall. Called the 'proposed central campus landmark' currently, it will be a representation of the coastal landscape, including the Cape Fear River. This landmark is in the very preliminary stages, primarily attempting to find funding through donations. The cost of the landmark will include the money necessary to replace the parking which will be taken to create it.

So be patient as the roads are torn up, or as the big gravel and cements trucks weave across campus; UNCW has the distinction of being one of the most beautiful campuses in the state, and the changes forthcoming symbolize our amazing growth and progress.

Contributors Honored By Board Of Trustees

(UNCW NEWS)—The UNCW Board of Trustees honored six individuals who have made significant contributions to the institution from its earliest days as Wilmington College to the present. As a result of their actions on Wednesday April 12, the university will name a building to honor John Burney Jr. and rename five campus streets.

The actions of the trustees which changed the campus map and a brief profile on the contributions of those honored are listed below. With the exception of T. T. Hamilton, all those honored live in Wilmington:

John J. Burney Jr. Student Support Center—the trustees named the Student Support Center in the heart of campus for John J. Burney Jr. in honor of his extensive and loyal service to the university. During his tenure as a state senator, he was instrumental in obtaining the initial $25,000 appropriation to be used for campus long-range planning that has resulted in the careful development of the campus' 650 acres. By appointment of the UNCW Board of Governors, Burney has also served two terms on the Board of Trustees from 1981-85, and 1985-89, including three terms as chairman in 1983, 1984, and 1985.

Hamilton Drive—named to honor T. T. Hamilton, principal of New Hanover High School and a key player in the early organizational efforts to make Wilmington College a reality. He was later named the first president of Wilmington College and served in this capacity from 1947-1951. Hamilton now resides in a rest home in Poquoson, Virginia.

Price Drive—named to honor James A. Price, who was named comptroller at UNCW in 1967, and later became vice chancellor for business affairs, the first for the young university. According to "From The Beginnings," a history of Wilmington College and UNCW's early days by Marshall Crews, Price played a significant role in organizing the area of business affairs from the time he was hired until his retirement in 1977.

Crews Drive—named to honor Dr. J. Marshall Crews, professor of mathematical sciences emeritus, who retired in May, 1981, after 33 years of continuous service to Wilmington College and The University of North Carolina at Wilmington. He began teaching at Wilmington College in 1948 when classes were held in New Hanover High School. His career included both teaching and administrative responsibilities. A scholarship is given in his name every year to a math major selected by department members.

Wagoner Drive—named to honor Chancellor William H. Wagoner for his long service to the institution, as the last president of Wilmington College in 1968 and as the first and only chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington from 1969 to the present. Under his leadership, the university has grown to a campus of 6,800 students, has added graduate programs, and has developed a highly respected academic reputation.

Appropriate ceremonies will be held at a later date to honor these individuals and to recognize their many contributions to the university.

Reynolds Drive—named to honor J. Paul Reynolds who was appointed the first academic dean of Wilmington College. He joined the college on July 1, 1964. In his book, Crews credits Reynolds with developing an "unsurpassed faculty and curriculum" at the college. His previous experience at larger institutions and his role in the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools had a great impact on preparing Wilmington College for accreditation and in moving it to a full-fledged senior institution which graduated its first four-year class in May 1965.

Six New Graduate Programs Add To Academic Progress

KAREN FOYE
NEWS EDITOR

The academic growth at UNCW is becoming more evident with the addition of six new graduate programs.

The Master's programs, which are scheduled to become available to students in the fall will include teaching, chemistry, biology, English, history, and mathematics.

Requirements for admission to these programs will include (1) a bachelor's degree from an accredited American college or university (or the equivalent from a foreign institution based on a four-year program), (2) a strong undergraduate record with at least a B average in courses prerequisite to the proposed area of graduate work, (3) satisfactory scores on specified examinations, and (4) three recommendations by individuals in professionally relevant fields.

These six new programs will be added to those that currently offer a graduate degree in marine biology, geology, business management and administration, elementary education, reading education, special education, educational administration and supervision, to increase the number to thirteen.

In June of 1988, UNCW named Dr. Eric Bolen as the Dean of the Graduate School.

"The biggest challenge will be to strive for the quality in graduate education that is commensurate with the expectations of the university and the system," said Bolen.

Before coming to UNCW, Bolen served for ten years as associate dean of the graduate school at Texas Tech University in Lubbock.

"Being the dean [of this new program] will give me the opportunity to build, to see things flourish, and to enhance the programs that are here at UNCW," said Bolen.

The addition of the six new programs will add a greater sense of accomplishment and prestige to the university.

"This is another milestone in the history of Wilmington College and The University of North Carolina at Wilmington. These graduate programs will serve us well in Southeastern North Carolina and the state in general," said Chancellor William H. Wagoner.

Greeks Experience Explosive Growth

BY CHAD ADAMS
MANAGING EDITOR

Twenty one years ago, Greek organizations were just beginning to become a significant part of the campus of UNCW, and few from then have survived until now, although the Greek community now prospers here.

In the spring of 1968, according to that year's Fledgling, UNCW had three fraternities, the first of which was Sigma Phi Kappa. It had been announced in December of 1967 that Pi Kappa Phi would colonize a chapter at UNCW and the most recent addition to the Greek Letter Society at that time was Delta Epsilon, which had been formed on the local level in the fall of 1967.

By 1972, UNCW had expanded its Greek community to include four fraternities and four sororities. Among the sororities was UNCW's first black sorority, Delta Sigma Theta.

Greek Life continued to grow as did the university, and by 1979, the Greek community had had significant changes in its structure. Service fraternities had been added as well as UNCW's first black fraternity, Omega Psi Phi, and UNCW's first business fraternity, Phi Kappa Lambda. Pi Kappa Phi remained as the only Greek organization to withstand the test of time. It was the only fraternity that remained from the three that had existed in 1968.

Local chapters began to pop up, as the existence of Delta Kappa Tate (no lie) was formally recognized as a member of UNCW's Greek system.

This year, UNCW has seen the largest growth in the Greek community to date. In this year alone, two new fraternities, Tau Delta Theta and Sigma Kappa Tau, and four new sororities, Sigma Pi Zeta, Sigma Chi Epsilon, Delta Kappa Pi and Kappa Pi Theta have been added.

The total number of current social Greek organizations on the UNCW campus is twenty four, including twelve fraternities and twelve sororities. And there exists the makings for yet another fraternity that will most likely become the twenty-fifth member of the Greek community and the thirteenth fraternity.

In addition to the social Greek system there exists one service fraternity, Alpha Phi Omega, and at least five academic fraternities.

For several years there has been talk of the possibility of a "Greek Row" either on campus or adjoining the campus. This idea became more feasible as a result of the findings of the city task force that dealt with the problem of off-campus parties and their effects on the city.

The task force had mentioned "Greek Row" as a way of giving the students somewhere to party within walking distance of the campus that would also allow students a place to party without disturbing area neighborhoods.

Dr. Richard Mullendore, Associate Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and chairman of the Greek Housing task force (not the city task force), is in the process of completing a Greek housing proposal to be presented to Dr. William Bryan, vice chancellor of student affairs, for approval.

"Greek Row" is still an idea at this point in time, but with the continued growth of the Greek community it is highly likely that it will become as real as the twenty four current fraternities and sororities are at UNCW.

Better Qualifications, Better Students

RICK HEYMANN
STAFF WRITER

"This process has allowed UNCW to pick the better qualified student out of the participating applicants pool," says Johnson.

The two-stage process differs from the old method of enrolling admissions in that all of the applications are held until a designated time. This will allow all of the applications to be reviewed at once. This process is utilized twice, hence the name "two-stage admissions process."

This process, therefore, allows the Admissions Office the compare individual applications with one another, whereas the old method was based on a first come, first serve basis.

Johnson cites the competition between applications, "as well as the testing of each application to meet university requirements is a major contributor to the academic quality of the student who attends UNCW."

As to the rising entrance requirements, Johnson states that Charles Cahill, Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs will ultimately decide on how they will be changed, with the Board of Trustees approval, sometime this summer.

"As of now," states Johnson, "The only changes in the entrance requirements will include an additional unit of science and an additional unit of math for the new student."

"The mere number of applications has actually been to our advantage," Johnson infers. He is referring to the drastic increase in the number of applications that the Admissions Office has received. At this time last year, 6765 applications had been received, while as of April 15 this year, 7571 were received.

"While receiving more applications than ever before, the Admissions Office can now use greater discretion in their search for students," he says.

"The single most limiting factor to UNCW's student population growth is the amount of money UNCW receives from the N.C. Legislature," says Johnson. All the money that the N.C. University System receives is allocated through the N.C. Legislature, in much the same way that the SGA allocates money to clubs here at UNCW.

The single most important reason why UNCW cannot have "Harvard quality" faculty is because UNCW cannot afford to pay "Harvard quality" salaries, Johnson infers.

With the combination of UNCW's reputation as a conscientiously growing university, and the steady addition of high quality faculty and students, UNCW will without a doubt continue to mature as an institution for years to come.

The road behind the Union is anticipated to relieve the flow of traffic around the front of the Union and back toward the dorms. It will be completed in July.

Construction at the new cafeteria is moving along, and is projected to be completed in October of this year. Both this cafeteria and the old one will be servicing UNCW students.

Azalea Fest Entertains

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

Last weekend Wilmington was overrun by tourists and celebrities. The 42nd annual Azalea Festival made a long entertaining weekend for residents, visitors, and celebrities alike. People flooded downtown in the rain Saturday for the Azalea Parade. For many it was the first opportunity to view this year's Queen Azalea, Rebecca Arthur of "Perfect Strangers." Saturday night's Coronation Pageant was an equally entertaining event. Actor J. Eddie Peck of "Dallas" and "Dynasty" was the master of ceremonies. Visiting celebrities included Jed Allen of "Santa Barbara," Tamara Tunie Bouquet of "As the World Turns," and Corey Moll of "Loving." Also in attendance were Miss Wilmington Marietta Hazard and Miss North Carolina Lee Beamon. Queen Azalea Rebecca Arthur entered Trask Coliseum under the crossed swords of cadets from the Virginia Military Institute. Governor Jim Martin was on hand to place the crown on her head. Miss Arthur said, "I have always wanted to be Miss America, but I just didn't have a prayer." The actress was quite content with her crown Saturday night. Frankie Valli and The Four Seasons entertained for the Coronation Pageant. The crowd stomped and clapped while waiting for the performers to take the stage. The musicians played their hit songs "Grease" and "Sherry" along with their many others. They closed the show with their own variation of (I Can't Get No) "Satisfaction." Saturday night, like the entire Azalea Festival weekend, was full of entertainment.

Workshop to be held

BY SUSIE WITKEGE
STAFF WRITER

There will be a poetry workshop held on the campus of UNCW April 22 from 9:30am to 3pm in room 214 Morton Hall.

The workshop is coordinated by Bob Collins and presented by The North Carolina Poetry Society, The UNCW Creative Writing Program, and The Wilmington Writers Forum.

The workshop leader will be Calvin Atwood, author of A Squadron of Roses. Atwood is presently the President of The North Carolina Poetry Society and The Georgia Poetry Society. In the past, Atwood taught at both UNC-CH and The University of Georgia. Atwood is also a veteran of Readers Theatre and a Master of Oral Interpretation.

The workshop will consist of Calvin Atwood critiquing selected participant's poetry. There will then be a poetry writing exercise for those participating and a discussion of contemporary poetry. It is recommended that participants bring their own lunch since the workshop lasts five and a half hours.

Calvin Atwood is a rare individual and I'm very excited about the workshop," says Bob Collins, coordinator for the poetry workshop.

Last year the workshop, which was presented by The North Carolina Poetry Society was held in Whiteville. Collins said he was glad that the workshop is in Wilmington this year because, "Wilmington's poets need the recognition that other larger city poets receive."

The workshop is also open to all closet-poets who wish to watch and participate in the discussion. If time permits, all those in attendance are invited to write and share individual poems.

"The whole idea of the workshop is to do something big and useful for Wilmington's present and future poets," says Bob Collins.

Symphony

(Press Release) For its final concert of the season, the Wilmington Symphony Orchestra will give a performance of Gustav Mahler's "Symphony No. 4", Saturday, April 22, 8:00 p.m., in Kenan Auditorium. Dr. Steven Erantne will conduct.

The "Symphony No. 4" is one of Mahler's shortest and most joyous works. The fourth movement is based on one of his happiest songs, "All Heavenly Joys Are Ours", an enchanting child's view of heaven.

General Admission, $5.00. Students and senior citizens, $3.00. For more information, call 791-9262.

Company Presents Comedy

(Press Release) Opera House Theatre Company proudly presents "Born Yesterday", a comedy by Garson Kanin, opening on April 19th at the Scottish Rite Temple, 1415 South 17th Street, Wilmington, N.C.

Lou Cricuolo will star as Harry Brock, the very rich, very crass schemer; Alexis Cheiffet will appear as Billie Dawn, his charming but dumb girlfriend; David Parker plays Ed Devery, the cynical lawyer and adviser to Brock; Richard Bunting is Paul Verrall, the idealistic writer hired to "smarten Billie up".

The all-star cast also features Nicky Hammerhead, Tommy Hull, Beverly Skinner, Jean Wenderlich, and Dale Wright.

Directed by Paul Mixon, "Born Yesterday" is as relevant to today's world of political scheming and payoffs as when first written and produced on Broadway in 1946. A revival of "Born Yesterday" is currently playing on Broadway, but local audiences can enjoy a wonderful production with a superb, professional cast right here in Wilmington.

All performances are at 8:00 p.m. April 19th through the 23rd and April 28th through the 30th. For ticket information and reservations call the Center Box Office at 763-3398 or 763-9328. Tickets are also available at the door.

Artists Grants Awarded

From a field of thirty applicants, winners of the 1989 emerging artists grants were announced Thursday night March 23rd at the annual meeting of the arts council of The Lower Cape Fear.

Recipients were Elizabeth Darrow, Steven Erantne, Steven Henegar, Steven Hill, Clair Rozier, Hiroshi Sueyoshi, and Margaret Worthington.

The emerging artists program, begun in 1988, is a grant program which provides financial support and recognition to committed artists, of the Lower Cape Fear with support of the North Carolina Arts Council, The Cape Fear Community Foundation, and Michael E. Armentrout. These grants are offered to all artists who have resided or been fully employed in New Hanover County for at least one year.

Ms. Darrow, a Painter, received a grant that will help her to pay for painting supplies, framing, publicity and transportation costs for a one-person show at the Fayetteville Museum of Art.

Steven Erantne, conductor for the Wilmington Symphony Orchestra, and a composer in his own right, was awarded a grant to purchase music manuscript software and appropriate computer hardware, thus, giving him more time to compose two commissioned works: one for North Carolina Music Teacher's Association and another for the Wilmington Symphony Orchestra.

The performance was conducted by Joe Hickman.

According to Hickman, "The German Requiem is a unique work in all the literature. It is more a celebration of life than it is a mass for the dead."

Many of the participants thought they were dead when they arrived at the last movement. The Requiem is vocally a very tiring piece, especially for voices such as soprano and tenor. The program, regardless, was received very well by local residents and UNCW students alike.

For more information regarding these artists or the Emerging Artists Grants Program, please call Amy Brannock executive Director, of the Arts Council of the Lower Cape Fear, telephone (919) 763-ARTS (2787).

UNCW Singers Perform "A German Requiem"

BY RODNEY T. JINGLE
STAFF WRITER

Last Monday, the UNCW Chamber Singers joined forces with the UNCW Concert Choir to perform "A German Requiem" by Johannes Brahms.

The Requiem or Ein Deutsches Requiem as it is written in German, is a difficult piece of musical literature which evolved over a period of 10 years. Brahms wrote the various movements at different years ranging from 1854 to 1864. In its finished form, it was composed of seven movements.

It was and still remains the most extensive work of any kind by Brahms. In spite of its lengthy creation, the work's individual movements fitted brilliantly together, with a tenacity that only Brahms could have achieved.

Unlike other Latin Requiems, which are usually prayers of peace for the dead, Brahms's Requiem was words of consolation for the living. Brahms carefully took many verses of the Bible out of context, and beautifully wove them together into a tapestry of music, that was completely devoid of any form of liturgical connotations.

What this means is that Brahms avoided using any words or passages that would single out any given religion or religious belief. Brahms stated that he would gladly substitute Human for German Requiem. He even omitted the name of Christ throughout the entire work. This work is nearly as well-known as Handel's Messiah.

This is the second time that the Requiem has been performed by UNCW. The first was on March 1, 1981 with the Wilmington Choral Society.

In Monday's performance, Alice Pierce, soprano and John Pierce, baritone were the featured soloists. Pianists Gregory Bell and Sherill Martin performed the two-piano version of the orchestration.

"MURDER ON FLINT STREET" Part 2

Movie Review

BY ELEANOR BROWN
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

Detectives John Walker and Maxwell Jones discussed their baffling case as they ate a meal of hamburgers and french fries. Their current star suspects had both lied about their activities the night before. The Medical Examiner had estimated that the time of death was between midnight and 4:00 a.m. and neither Laurie nor Michael Montgomery could be accounted for during that time.

The family chauffeur had seen Laurie Montgomery leaving the family estate shortly after midnight and had not seen her return. The brother Michael, according to Maureen Drew, had been on his way home at midnight after dropping her off at her apartment. It shouldn't have taken him more than fifteen minutes to reach the Montgomery mansion, however, he didn't arrive until 3:15 a.m. The butler was certain of the time because he had seen the grandfather clock in the foyer when he locked the door after young Mr. Montgomery came in. Covering all bases, Walker had checked out the employees of Holsten, Holsten, and Adams. When his father died three years before, Adams had become a full partner after only being with the firm for two years. All of the members of the Holsten clan had attended a family affair Wednesday evening which ended around 3:00 a.m. Both Jeffrey and Joshua Holsten had gone directly home after the party. Their wives corroborated their stories. The law firm had two junior members, Catherine Ingram and Howard Day. Career advancement could have been the motive for murder. If that were the case, only Day could be considered a suspect as Miss Ingram was leaving the firm to get married. Day might merit further investigation, thought Walker, as he could possibly become a full partner in the firm with Adams out of the way.

He ran a computer check on the young lawyer and came up with two interesting bits of information. One, Howard Day had been convicted on an assault charge as a college student and two, he owned a handgun, a .357 to be exact. He sent a black and white to pick Day up for questioning.

Meanwhile, Maxwell Jones was confronting the two Montgomery heirs with their fraudulent alibis. Both young people were visibly shaken as he interrogated each of them separately.

Laurie hardly gave more information than name, rank, and serial number before she demanded to have her lawyer present. When Jones reminded her that her lawyer was dead, she burst into tears.

He left her with a box of tissues and went to question her brother. "Where were you between midnight and 3:15 a.m., Mr. Montgomery?"

"I told you I dropped off my girlfriend at midnight and went straight home," Michael said, sticking to his story.

The detective relished his reply, "You couldn't have gone straight home, Mr. Montgomery, you didn't arrive there until 3:15 a.m." "Says who?" Michael asked belligerently.

"Says your butler. You remember him. He's the guy who opens the front door of your big fancy house. He says you returned at 3:15 a.m. not 12:15 a.m. Where were you during that time?"

Deciding to come clean, Michael said, "I was alone in my car. I drove around to clear my head after an evening of Maureen's manipulations. She wants to hear wedding bells. I can't prove where I was, but I swear I didn't kill anybody."

"Do you own a handgun," Jones asked, moving to another line of questioning.

"Two, a .38 and a .357," he replied, "My uncle gave them to me."

Twenty more minutes of questioning revealed that Michael possessed a key to his aunt's house. He definitely had a motive for killing the lawyer, Jones reasoned, and the gun and key were means and opportunity. But, what about the girl, he puzzled. Either one of them could have killed Adams to get the money or they could have done it together. He needed to finish questioning Laurie Montgomery.

His partner met him in the hall and briefed him on the new suspect, Howard Day. And we usually can't get enough suspects, thought Jones as he told Walker about the .357 and the key to the aunt's house which were in Montgomery's possession.

Young and pretty, Irene Waters was one of many uniformed officers who aspired to be a detective and she was elated to have accomplished the task that Detective Jones had given her.

Concealing her pleasure, she calmly informed them, "I located Harriet Montgomery at General Hospital."

Walker said, perplexed, "She wasn't there when we checked earlier this afternoon."

"She was brought in by her friends the Sneads. Apparently they found her unconscious outside their home early this morning. She refused to go to the hospital until they finally insisted. She's being treated for a sprained ankle and a head injury."

Jones volunteered, "I'll stay and get both guns in here for a ballistics test and finish interrogating our abundance of suspects."

"Right," Walker replied, "I'll go question Harriet Montgomery at the hospital."

Harriet was sitting propped up on pillows in her hospital bed, when Detective Walker walked in. He noted her pale complexion, salt and pepper hair, and the bandage on her forehead as he introduced himself.

She spoke in a low voice as she answered his questions. She didn't know how Roger Adams came to be in her house; the house had been empty when she left for church. On her way home she had fallen, spraining her ankle and injuring her head. "I had no idea Roger was dead until I arrived at the hospital. It's dreadful," she finished weakly, falling back on the pillows.

"Why were you walking?" he questioned. "Don't you have a car?"

"I never drive. I don't like cars," she declared forcefully. "They killed my husband and my daughter!" He vaguely recalled Edward's death in a car accident years before. Her daughter Elizabeth, he remembered, had committed suicide two months before by carbon monoxide asphyxiation. They had found a suicide note which blamed an unrequited love for the decision to take her life.

Walker moved to another question. "What time was it when you fell, Mrs. Montgomery?"

"I'm not sure. I left the church after 11 o'clock because I was using the typewriter in the office after the service. It's so much nicer than the one I have," she said, smiling sweetly.

"You fell outside the Snead's residence and were lying there all night," he pressed.

"I think I was unconscious. I only remember Bill picking me up this morning and carrying me into his house. He and Agnes made such a fuss."

Meanwhile back at the police station, Maxwell Jones questioned Howard Day. Day had an airtight alibi. He had been at the police station in Raleigh all night because his kid brother had been arrested. A quick phone call to the Raleigh police had verified this. There was no point in holding him for further questioning.

Jones put the screws to Laurie Montgomery. After an hour of hard questioning, she finally broke. "Where were you between midnight and 4:00 a.m.," he demanded for the hundredth time.

"I went to meet Roger. We've been seeing each other secretly for months. If my brother knew, he'd kill me. He hated Roger," she sobbed.

"You met with Adams?" he asked, surprised. This was more than he had hoped for.

"No, I never saw him. He left a note for me on the door saying that he had to meet someone. I still have it," she said pulling a piece of paper out of her purse. "I couldn't bring myself to throw it out."

Jones looked at the note, careful not to smudge any prints. They would have to check for Adams' fingerprints on the page as well as analyze the handwriting.

The note said, "Darling, I have to see someone. Meet me at the same time tomorrow night. I love you, Roger."

Jones met Officer Waters in the hall as he was carrying the note to the lab. "John just called," she informed him, "He wants you to do a paraffin test on the two Montgomerys and Howard Day. He's bringing Harriet Montgomery's clothing in for testing."

Max knew the test might not be any help with so much time having elapsed since the shooting, but it was worth a try. He performed the test on the two outraged young people. The results were negative. He wondered if neither of them had killed Adams or if all traces of powder had merely worn off.

Walker and Jones were discussing the case over their coffee Friday morning when they received the lab report. Definite traces of gunpowder had been found on Harriet Montgomery's clothes. The detectives arrested her at the hospital as she was being discharged. After being confronted with the evidence, Harriet gave a full confession. Her daughter Elizabeth had been in love with Roger Adams who had dumped her for her wealthier cousin. She lured him to her house, shot him using her late husband's gun, and fell purposefully in order to give herself an alibi.

Major League 4-stars--It's baseball season again and here come the baseball movies. Last summer we had Bull Durham, Stealing Home, Eight Men Out, etc., and this year looks like more are to come.

Major League stars talented actor Tom Berenger (Platoon), Charlie Sheen (Platoon, Wall Street), and Corbin Bernsen (LA Law, Me Again) as members of the forever losing Cleveland Indians.

The team's new owner wants to finish last so she can move the club to Miami and get out of Cleveland, so she puts together a team of misfits and has-beens that are sure to lose.

This movie is not a great film that will change the way you look at social issues, but who really cares about that because this movie is serious FUN! Charlie Sheen and Tom Berenger shake off their serious sides and have fun with their roles as Ricky Vaughn (Sheen) the part-time juvenile delinquent pitching ace and Jake Roberts (Berenger) a has-been catcher with bad knees.

If any of you know a baseball player you will enjoy this movie because it is a funny, fast, and accurate portrayal of the players of America's favorite pastime.

very critical. They were afraid that he may have suffered permanent brain damage, or might even be brain dead. There was a lot of unverified speculation in the beginning because of the fact that he was unable to breathe on his own, and had to be put on a respirator," said Lindstrom's roommate Dan Levenson.

On Sunday Lindstrom regained consciousness, and was responding to family members, ending any speculation that he may have been brain dead.

"Kurt had attempted to talk, but at this point they're not sure whether or not he'll be able to talk again due to the damage done to his vocal region," said Levenson.

The tragedy of the incident is that Lindstrom is presently paralyzed, with no feeling or movement from below his neck. According to Levenson, "Doctors at this point say that he will never walk again, whether he will regain any movement from below his neck is undetermined."

Detective Pat Pridgen of the Wilmington Police Department has led the investigation into the shooting since Saturday night, and has accumulated a number of various reports based on eyewitnesses.

"We have talked to over 100 people who had some account of what had happened. Unfortunately we also have a variety of different stories, as well as numerous makes of cars involved," said Pridgen.

Students that were present at the party feel that the police should have played a role in the crowd ...

According to Det. Pridgen, the biggest problem that they are facing is the fact that much of the information provided by students has to be disregarded due to the degree of intoxication of witnesses.

"We simply cannot rely on the accounts that had initially been provided to us on Saturday night, most of the people were just too drunk. A few could not even remember speaking with us the next day," said Pridgen.

From the reports provided the police have come up with a composite drawing of the girl in the car. "We have a few suspects in the working. A few students feel that they recognize the girl from on campus. It's simply a matter of placing a name with the face," said Pridgen.

The Wilmington police are still interested in any leads that anyone could provide. They assure that any all witnesses will remain confidential.

"I'm not interested in what anyone was doing at the party, whether they were drinking under age or whatever. I'm only concerned with information regarding the actual shooting. We are racing against time with the end of the semester coming up next week," said Pridgen.

The issue of the Twinwood party being the underlying factor responsible for the shooting of Lindstrom, has resulted in a considerable amount of finger pointing. Many members of the Wilmington community are familiar with the problems that arise from off campus parties, and feel that the university has a responsibility to control the actions of its students.

"I am very concerned with the problem of off campus parties, however as I have said before, in following the student code book, we as a university, in accordance with the Joint Statement of Rights and Freedoms of Students, should never duplicate the actions of the city," responded Vice Chancellor William Bryan.

"We can only become involved when it has direct application to the welfare of the campus," continued Bryan.

Students that were present at the party feel that the police should have played a role in controlling the crowd that was growing unstable as the evening continued.

"It seems very convenient for people to blame the students for what had happened. I don't think that you can point a finger at any one reason, it was just an isolated unfortunate incident. I do feel that the police seemed inconsistent with their usual routine to break these parties up before 11:30," said Levenson.

According to an anonymous source, the Wilmington police were called in regards to the Twinwood party becoming rowdy, after an attempt to drive through the development. The police responded by apologizing that they were unable to do anything about it due to the amount of men assigned to the Azalea Festival. The police have no record of such a report.

"We had to assume that the party was under control, even taking into account its size, because we did not receive a single complaint until after the incident had occurred," said Pridgen.

The news of Lindstrom's condition spread quickly through the campus, evoking a wave of support.

Denise Paliwoda, a member of Delta Kappa Phi, was one of the first students to take action, in the form of the Kurt Lindstrom Investigative Fund. "At first I felt that it would be a good idea to collect money from all the sororities and fraternities on campus to get some kind of a reward up, in hopes that someone would come forward," said Paliwoda.

Her plan then extended to a city wide fund raising attempt, established through NCNB. Anyone interested in donating money to the Kurt Lindstrom Investigative Fund should get in touch with Denise Paliwoda at 392-9206.

The Chi Phi fraternity promises to pledge $1 for every ticket sold from their upcoming Fishbone concert on April 25 to be donated to the Lindstrom family.

In addition to campus concern and involvement, many outside organizations have made donations and contributions to support the Lindstrom Family in their time of need.

Hawks Beat Stats

Baseball is indeed a funny game. It is the only sport where one third of the games will distinguish a champion from an also ran. I once read where Sparky Anderson said that no matter how good your team is, you will lose one third of your games and no matter how bad you are, you will win one third. It's the final third, he continued that will make or break your season.

That statement has a lot of merit, especially when you consider the events of the past weekend where UNCW, an overwhelming underdog (on paper) took on the 30th best team in the country, and whipped them twice to win the regular season title.

A quick glance at the CAA scoreboard and you will find that the Pirates dominate every single statistical category.

ECU has five of the league's top 15 hitters, led by junior Calvin Brown's pace-setting .408 average. The Seahawks leading everyday hitter is Tom Heitler who's average is .290. Tommie Adams is hitting .351 but lacks the necessary at bats to qualify.

The Pirates also statistically dominate the RBI race. Brown, ranked first, having driven in 39 while teammate Tommy Eason is in second with 33.

Heitler leads the Hawks with 19 and is not mentioned in the league's top ten.

The home run race reads like a "Who's Who" of ECU. Brown (who else?) tops the charts with 10 round trippers and two other teammates have hit more than five.

UNCW has no one who has hit five this year.

The Pitching is even more lopsided. ECU has two guys who give up less than one earned run a game. It's hard to lose when the other team doesn't score on you.

As a team the Pirates pitching staff is limiting opponents to just 2.25 earned runs per contest, almost five fewer than what their offense is scoring per contest.

Given that, and the fact that ECU had not lost at home all year, how in the world, Coach Guthrie, did you pull off the improbable?

"It's probably only me that thought things were stacked against us," Guthrie said. "This group just goes out and plays hard. That's what we do best."

They do indeed. All year long this team has constantly put to rest the nightmarish 11-42 season of a year ago and regained the consistency and chemistry that led them to their first title two years ago.

It was that final one third that made the season for the Hawks, who split the first two games with the Pirates. And they won.

Seahawks Capture CAA Crown

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

On paper, this wasn't supposed to happen.

UNCW won its second regular season Colonial Athletic Association title in three years Monday night with a 4-3 extra inning victory over favored East Carolina at Harrington Field.

ECU, led by hot-hitting first baseman Calvin Brown, had five members of their squad hitting above .310 and threw two pitchers in the three game series who had not lost all year.

The Pirates led the conference in several categories including home runs and ERA, and appeared on paper to be the superior team.

The Seahawks entered the climatic showdown a single game ahead of the Pirates, meaning whomever won two of three would win the conference.

Ed Stoudemire, whose solo home run in the third had given UNCW a 2-0 lead, reached on a throwing error with one out in the tenth. He moved to second on a groundout, and scored on Trent Mongero's RBI double when ECU catcher Tommy Eason dropped the throw home.

"This was as good as any game I've been involved in," UNCW head coach Bobby Guthrie said.

"There were not many mistakes. It was just a great game."

UNCW opened quickly, racing out to a 3-0 lead right fielder Perry Currian's RBI groundout, Stoudemire's solo shot, and Randy Fennells solo home run in the fourth.

"I said earlier that we had the potential to be a good home run hitting team," Guthrie said. "It was an emotional win for us."

ECU's Brown, who lit up Seahawk pitching for five hits, including a home run in the twinbill, could do no better than 0-5 with one RBI, Monday.

The Pirates trailed 3-2 going into the ninth, but evened the game as Mike Andrews doubled, and scored on a pair of sacrifices.

Tony Tillman (2-3) then closed out UNCW's season by slamming the door on the Pirates in the tenth. He retired the first two batters in order and after an John Gast reached on an error, he caught Steve Godwin looking at a called third strike.

"It feels great," Guthrie said. "We were up against the 30th best team in the nation, a team that hadn't lost at home all year, and we came in here and took two. We faced two undefeated pitchers in two days."

Tillman recorded his first complete game of the season, limiting the Pirate offense to a meager three runs and seven hits.

UNCW set up the clinching victory by beating undefeated Pirate ace Jonathan Jenkins in the first game of Sunday's doubleheader, 5-3, in nine innings.

Jenkins entered the game with an astounding 0.43 ERA and is regarded as the conference's premiere pitcher.

The hard throwing right-hander came back however to record a complete game shutout in game two to set up the finale.

The Seahawks (14-1, 23-10) will play either William and Mary or George Mason in the opening round of the CAA tournament which will be held at Brooks Field, May 9-11.

CHAMPION RECEIVES AUTOMATIC BID TO NCAA BASEBALL TOURNAMENT

WINNING YEAR

BY MAI NGUYAN
SEAHAWK SPORTS WRITER

As the softball season subtly comes to a close, the softball Seahawks may happily reflect upon their highly successful season. With a present record of 27-11, the Seahawks have turned the tables to make 1989 a winning year.

Although it remains to be seen whether or not the Lady Seahawks can maintain their record of never losing twice in a double-header, they have already proven their skills as worthy players.

"I'm extremely pleased with the girls' performance this year," comments Coach Maggie St. Ledger. "They now possess a winning attitude and a new confidence towards the game," she further adds. Another key factor which has led the Seahawks to success is the consistency in batting. Previously, the team had to rely on several strong batters whereas now the entire team is efficient in hitting the ball.

The Lady Seahawks have also been able to maintain their composure, defensively, with runners in the scoring position.

"We've cut down on mental errors," remarked St. Ledger. "We've concentrated on making the proper plays."

Coach St. Ledger feels that pitchers Rita Scott (2.29 ERA) and Ingrid Meyers (2.32 ERA) have made huge contributions to the team.

They (Meyers and Scott) have made remarkable progress considering they are relatively new to the game of fast pitch softball," St. Ledger said.

Right Fielder Yaki Henry, who has a batting average of .457, believes that the team's strong defense is the reason for their recent success. The Seahawks will truly be able to test their skills when they face Chapel Hill on Monday April 24. Coach St. Ledger would like to end the season with a strong record in hopes of receiving an invitation to the Tennessee Tournament next year.

The Seahawks will use their final six games to prepare for the upcoming CAA tournament.

Around the Seahawk Sports World

PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

This is it, the last fun-filled issue of the Seahawk. The last sports page of 1989 and my final article on the extracurricular activities of UNCW students. Did I just hear champagne bottles popping in the background trying to hide muffled cheers of joy.

This year has been full of mile stones for UNCW teams. We have had many surprises to say the least. Who would have figured our basketball team would have come within a couple minutes of an invitation to the NCAA being denied by a pesky unknown patriot named George Mason and his right hand general Col. (Kenny) Sanders.

Who would have believed that J.R. Reid would actually come to UNCW. Well ok, I only believed it for a couple of hours. Nobody who spend their Spring Break in Hampton, Virginia would forget the numb feeling of upsetting the CAA Champs, the Richmond Spiders. Everyone will claim the trip was unforgettable, the rainy frigid weather however helps this cause.

The talents of Larry Houser, Greg Bender, and Antonio Howard, will be sorely missed as they gave their all to the team. And the team celebrated their effort and spirit by throwing an illegal keg party one evening. Hey guys this bud for you!

From the hard courts to the hard ground came the exciting playing of Seahawk Soccer. What Hawkster can't remember seeing Chris George steaking down right side of the field and heading in a long cross-field pass for a goal. Speaking of streaking, what ever happen to that unknown faculty member?

The Green Machine under the guidance of Coach Jackie Blackmore led his youthful recruits to their first winning season ever in CAA history. Deno, Rosie, and Crazy are not a name of a new rock band but were the backbone of a Hawk defense that limited their opposition to 1.85 goals a game. The team improved every game and made strides to forming a soccer power at U.N.C.W.

Speaking of power who dared to ignore those dynamite serves and dives of Heather Kimel, Yvonne Holan, Dede Foley of our Hawk volleyball team that posted 30-3 winning record. The team that usually send opponents home early by sweeping them 3 matches to zero. A team that missed going to the NCAA Championships by falling valiantly to a determined William and Mary Squad. A gritty bunch of girls who never gave up and played with their hearts.

Hearts, guts, scrappiness all describe our only CAA champion this year the UNCW baseball team.

The Kardiac Kids could also be applied as our team often fought their way back from early inning deficits to wins. Strong Defense and hot hitting was the recipe for the Hawks as they set a conference record with a 14-1 CAA mark. They won the Championship in style by defeating the dominating pitching of the ECU Pirates.

Then there were the cheerleader and the swimmers and the intramural teams that took to the field or pool of battle to represent our university. Do you remember holding that stop watch during the CAA Swimming Championship and experiencing the excitement of watching a Laurie Grant, Nick Revelas, or Mary Beth Mills perform their talents before you.

Think how the cheerleaders felt when they were told they were going to the Championships. Think how the Seahawks felt when he read my article naming him as the source of illegal drug trafficking. Our Ultimate frisbee who won their first tournament team exhibits the dedication UNCW athletes put forth for their alma mater.

This has been an interesting year for Seahawk sports teams. They been involved in controversies and Championships but most important they played the game to their best abilities.

NAA to Meet

The student chapter of the National Association of Accountants will hold their first meeting of the 1989-90 school year at 6:30 p.m., 30 August. The meeting will be held in Room 214, Cameron School of Business. For further information contact the Accounting and Law Department at 395-3506.

Football Meeting

Team Meeting for all new and returning players, managers, trainers, and coaching staff will be held on Wednesday, August 30th. It will be in the University Union room #201 at 4 p.m. Anyone interested in being a part of the 1989 football season should attend. If unable to do so, please leave your name and phone in the SGA office or call 395-3595.

New Ordinance Changes Student Life

CELESTE E. RULLEY
CONTRIBUTING WRITER

Students who came to UNCW planning to get a house with friends for this school year had better think again: New Haver County revamped an existing housing ordinance over the summer making it illegal to have more than three unrelated people living in a single residence. The ordinance in question, which originally allowed five nonrelated people to live together, now closely resembles an existing city ordinance.

Spurred into action by last year's problems with noise and parties in the College Acres neighborhood (adjoining the campus past the water tower), residents there joined together in presenting their case for the change to the County Planning Council. Peter Avery of the County Planning & Developing Department clarified the changes: "My understanding is that existing situations are not affected. If you'll read the ordinance, it doesn't say anything about existing situations...it really just redefines 'family' [which is the determining unit for this ordinance]."

Assistant Dean of Students Jacquie Skinner, working on the University end of the situation, explained that the ordinance would not affect students who hold leases signed before the ordinance went into effect in June. These students, however, would not be able to legally resign a lease with more than three roommates unrelated by blood or marriage.

The ordinance is targeted at halting the establishment of informal fraternity houses by Delta Sigma Phi, Sigma Alpha Epsilon and Pi Kappa Phi as was done in the College Acres neighborhood last school year. "They were not official chapter houses, and did not have the permit to allow them [to be in that neighborhood]," said Dr. William Bryan, vice chancellor of Student Affairs.

Fraternities and sororities can obtain a permit to establish a house and bypass the new ordinance, but the process can be long. "It's a matter of establishing compatibility," said Burpeau. "Fraternities and other benevolent organizations can obtain permits if it can be established that they would be compatible [with the neighborhood]. The Planning Department would help them, and they go through a checklist trying to identify and approach specific potential problems."

...Making it illegal to have more than three unrelated people living in a single residence...

But not going through the proper channels results in two separate violations if the group is discovered: the violation of establishment of a fraternity or sorority house without a permit, and exceeding the allowed number of people.

Although admittedly difficult to enforce, violation of this ordinance carries a hefty fine in terms of the average student budget—$50 per day per violation for the duration of the violation, said County Attorney Kemp Burpeau. "This offense carries a misdemeanor charge."

There are two ways New Haver County expects to be informed of violations. The first is the usual method, information from adjoining homeowners or tenants. The second is less common: county inspections. Burpeau said he knew of no plans for the county to inventory the neighborhoods. According to Avery, the ordinance affects only the unincorporated county, which leaves Wrightsville Beach and Carolina Beach exempt for now. "Although I know of no plans to do so, it is entirely up to Wrightsville Beach to change their ordinance [regarding housing]...they may decide to sit down and debate this same [restriction]."

In an effort to soothe the tension, the University is trying to promote better community relations while keeping the students informed of their rights and responsibilities as tenants through several programs. The most immediate is the barbecue being held here Saturday August 26. It's being called the Town-Gown Barbecue ('gown' an allusion to academic robes), and is an open invitation for the community to come eat a free meal with students and to take a better look at UNCW.

The University, headed by the Dean of Students Office, has also developed a booklet for students elaborating on their rights as tenants. "We are responding to the situation between the community and UNCW with an effort to inform students of law changes, and to provide more than just a channel for questions when problems arise; we want to provide people to clarify, not just to field complaints," said Bryan.

According to Bryan, the next step for UNCW is the establishment of a standing University/Community committee to foster positive relations between the city, county, Wrightsville Beach and the school. Members of the student body, faculty and administration will be on the committee. "The students' need to know the mood of the community," said Skinner. "The city is having growing pains, so there is a lot of tension in the community anyway."

"We want to be good neighbors," said Bryan. "It's not easy, but these are the ways to break down the walls and get students thinking."

Chancellor Waggoner Welcomes You

For those of us who work in a University environment, each year begins, not on January 1st, but on the day the residence halls open for the fall semester.

Our spirits refreshed by some time off for travel or study or just "laying out", we eagerly begin the new adventure of another year of teaching and learning, fully convinced each year that it will be even better than the last one.

It is in that spirit and on behalf of the faculty and staff that I welcome you to the fall 1989 semester which will be a banner year for you and for this institution.

The campus is more beautiful than ever; there are brand new spaces for living and dining; there is much to do and much to be learned; so let's get to it! Welcome, welcome, welcome.

Welcome Week '89 Strives to Entertain

BY ALLEN RAY
ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR

A new tradition begins this week as Student Activities and SGA present "Welcome Week". This week long series of events will give students an opportunity to become involved on campus and will also give the community a chance to become acquainted with students and university organizations.

Some highlights from earlier in the week included concerts in the union courtyard by folk artist Ed Kilbourne on Tuesday and the Voltage Brothers on Wednesday night. At the Voltage Brothers show partygoers were treated to free food and drinks provided by local businesses. Another special feature at the show was the opportunity for students over 21 years old to bring up to four beers. According to Jim Humphries, SGA president, the experiment seemed to be well taken. "Everyone is cooperating fine," he said.

On Tuesday and Wednesday the Army ROTC gave demonstrations of their equipment, while a plant sale was held Wednesday morning and afternoon. For the more athletic minded there are a series of intramural sports events. The first two events, football and softball games, were barely considered successful due to minimal participation.

"Most students were probably too busy getting settled in," explained Lanita Hansen, assistant director of student activities. A volleyball game is scheduled for tonight, and basketball is on tap for Friday. The tournament finals on Saturday should prove to draw the largest crowds since there are no classes.

The biggest event of "Welcome Week" will also take place Saturday on the University Commons lawn with the Town/Gown BBQ. The city council is funding this dinner with the intent of promoting better community relations with students. All members of the local community are invited to the party. Members of the city police and fire departments will cook hamburgers and hotdogs for everyone who attends. Pepsi is donating drinks and B-100 radio will be on hand with music. "Welcome Week" will provide an excellent opportunity to improve Campus-Community relations through increased personal interaction.

Cancelled Classes Anger Students

BY TASHA BOONE
MANAGING EDITOR

Many returning students are disgusted and upset because their classes are cancelled. This happens every year, however, this year was somewhat different. The North Carolina legislature was late meeting and setting tuition fees. By the beginning of August, bills had still not been sent out.

The University of North Carolina decided to remedy this matter by sending out notices to every student requiring them to sign and return the slips to the cashier's office by August 10. These papers had to be signed so pre-registered students would not lose their classes.

Even though this seems easy enough, many students did not send in their slips of paper or they missed the deadline. As a result their classes were cancelled.

Vice Chancellor William Bryan felt that sending a single notice would be easier and avoid excessive confusion. An alternative would have been to send out two bills. One bill would have been sent with last year's tuition prices and then a second would have been required to show the balance after the legislature had met and set this year's higher tuition prices. Other universities took this form of action, for example, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

The notices may have confused some students despite any good intentions. The result of the confusion was a few more class cancellations than usual. Students who did not return their slips on time are upset because now they have to re-register and many of the classes that they had signed up for previously were already closed.

Contrary to rumor, the number of cancellations due to the misunderstandings was not immense. Some unofficial estimates place the difference at only around a hundred more than usual.

Why bother with this system at all? Vice Chancellor Bryan comments that this is one way of making class room for many incoming students. If some students don't return their bills with payments then classes are dropped. This system opens class slots for other students. Is it fair? What's fair? Is there a better system? The only key or solution now is to beat the deadline.

Travel: Safer in the '80's Any Way you Go

Americans are on the go in record numbers, but many don't realize that any way you travel, it's safer today than ever before, according to Transportation Secretary Jim Burnley. Stricter federal safety rules, enthusiastic grassroots safety movements and increasing industry efforts have given travelers in the U.S. the safest transportation systems in the world.

Federal Aviation Administration requirements for airplanes to have fire resistant seat cushions, improved flammability standards for cabin interiors, and fire resistant liners for baggage compartments increase survivability in case of a crash. Rules requiring on-board windshear detection equipment improve the odds against a crash ever occurring.

"These are just a sample of the Department of Transportation's commitment to achieving continued reductions in fatalities in the air, on our highways, railways and waterways," Burnley says. "Any transportation fatality is one too many."

From major airlines to small private planes, safety has improved in terms of number of accidents and number of fatalities. In the first nine months of 1988, near midair collision reports, air traffic controller errors, air fatality rates, flight delays and airline consumer complaints all declined significantly.

Airplane accidents, always a national media story, may seem like transportation's "darkest tragedy"—except to those who have lost a loved one in an auto crash, usually only reported in the local press. This media distinction may explain why some people still think it's safer to drive than fly.

Even on our highways, however, motorists enjoy an unprecedented level of safety. The highway fatality rate has dropped 25 percent since 1980, resulting in some 86,000 lives being saved.

Safety belt use has increased from 11 percent in the early '80s to 46 percent today, and 32 states and the District of Columbia have safety belt laws. All states have laws requiring child passenger safety seats. Drunk driving, the number one highway killer, has also declined 14 percent since 1982.

Major safety improvements in new cars have helped, too. By 1990, all new cars will be equipped with either air bags or automatic safety belts, as well as lap and shoulder belts in the rear.

In the 1980s, railroad accident rates dropped by two-thirds, led by even greater declines in the number of accidents due to faulty track and equipment.

Finally, the Coast Guard has kept safety of life and property at sea its primary mission, and the American merchant marine is the safest in the world.

"We must continue to work to cut the margin of error," Burnley concludes. "Whether it's riding the roads of drunk drivers or getting more people to use safety belts, or removing drug use from all forms of transportation, we can and will do more."

Blockade Runner Bringing Back Lumina

WILMINGTON—Bathing beauties, silent films and the big band sound will be joined with a classic 1950s sock hop Saturday, August 26, 1989, from 8:30 P.M. until midnight for the fourth annual Lumina Night at the Blockade Runner Resort Hotel. Tickets are $25.00 per person with the proceeds to be used for exhibits in the new museum.

Lumina, the "Fun Spot of the South," operated at the southern end of Wrightsville Beach between 1905 and 1973. The famed pleasure palace hosted the best big bands of the era and presented silent movies projected on an outside screen located in the surf.

It was as Lewis Phillip Hall said in his book Land of the Golden River, Volume I, "an ideal spot to take a girl on a moonlight night."

This year Lumina Night will feature the Joe Childers Band playing big band music in the Robert E. Lee Ballroom while a Rock-O-La juke box will fill the Nighthawk Room with classic hits from the 1950s. Other amenities include a swimsuits exhibit of Lumina bathing beauties, and hors d'oeuvre buffet, free coca-colas, a cash bar and a raffle.

Silent movies over the ocean will again be part of Lumina Night with favorites like The Great Train Robbery, The Bangville Police, and Felix in FairyLand to be shown. The silent movies are free.

Tickets are available at Belk Berry in Independence Mall, The Blockade Runner Resort Hotel, Wrightsville Beach and New Hanover County Museum, 814 Market Street.

Professor Shortage Worsening-Forecasts Coming True

LSU's Vincent Brenner: "We've never had a year where we've been fully staffed."

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE/LSU PUBLIC RELATIONS

(CPS) -- Students on half the campuses in the country will find their schools suffering from some sort of shortage of professors this fall, the American Council on Education (ACE) predicts.

While experts have been forecasting colleges in the 1990's will suffer drastic faculty shortages -- perhaps up to 100,000 campus-level teaching jobs will remain unfilled for lack of qualified people -- The ACE report is the first to indicate the problems may have started.

Half the campuses surveyed earlier in August by the ACE, a trade group for college presidents based in Washington, D.C., reported their searches for qualified teaching applicants take longer than in previous years.

And when they find someone they want to hire, half the schools say they're having trouble convincing the applicants to take the jobs.

"We've seen the proportion of campuses reporting difficulty in this area nearly double in the last two years, and we expect this trend to continue into the 1990's," warned the ACE's Elaine El-Khawas, author of the report.

El-Khawas found colleges are having the most trouble finding computer science, math, health and business professors.

Nationwide, 15 percent of all the tenure-track business professorships went unfilled for the entire 1988-89 school year, estimates the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business (AACSB), the St. Louis-based group that accredits campus business curricula.

To keep up, campuses will need to hire 37 percent more professors by the year 2003, estimated Mike McGuire, senior planning officer at Franklin and Marshall College in Pennsylvania, where he recently finished a study of faculty attrition at 29

For students, it means more of their classes will be taught by graduate assistants and, presumably, not as effectively as they would have been with fully trained professors at the head of the room.

Louisiana State University, for example, has lost so many professors just in the last eight months that some of its administrators are worried some LSU programs may lose their accreditation.

"There's a crying need for people to go to teach,"

Ten of LSU's 18 accounting faculty members have left since January, reported department Chairman Vincent Brenner.

In all, 120 professors have left LSU's Baton Rouge campus in 1989, provoked by uncertainty of what will happen to them after a reorganization of the state's higher education system and by persistently low salaries.

At the 14-campus California State University system, administrators are gearing up for a shortage of 10,000 to 11,000 faculty over the next 10 to 15 years, thanks to a projected surge in enrollment and mass retirements of professors hired during the 1960's, when the CSU system was being formed.

To combat the problem, CSU is offering financial incentives and even to forgive loans to students who agree to go on to get doctorates and, ultimately, teach at CSU. "Right now, the Ph.D. pipeline isn't providing the numbers needed," said CSU spokesman Steve McCarthy. "The bottom line is that we have to get more people into the Ph.D. pipeline," McGuire added.

Bachelors degrees in fields like engineering and computer science are winning students starting salaries of $30,000 to $35,000 this summer, the College Placement Council in Bethlehem, Pa., reported in late July.

As a result, students can choose between making a good salary or going on to grad school for four more years, during which they often will go deeper into debt. With their doctoral degrees, moreover, they would then face a career of teaching which would earn them far less than they could make in private industry.

Shrinking federal support for colleges since 1980 has made it even harder for colleges to find money to raise professors' salaries, some observers noted.

Yet, at least in LSU's accounting department, finding qualified professors has always been a battle. "We've never had a year where we've been fully staffed," Brenner declared. "The accounting shortage has been going on for 20 years."

To fill the gaps, Brenner has relied on graduate students to teach middle level classes, thus defying AACSB accreditation standards.

"It can be destroyed in a matter of one or two years," Brenner said of the department's reputation. "We're going to be in really bad shape."

"There's a crying need for people to go to teach," added Dick Willis of the Engineering Manpower Commission in Washington, D.C., who said that some 1,800 of the 20,000 available teaching positions were vacant last year.

Willis, like most others, thinks this is just the beginning.

Franklin and Marshall's McGuire agreed. "We've still got five to eight more years before things get critical."

McGuire also foresaw wealthier universities raiding other schools for faculty, causing huge rifts in the quality of education among various schools.

In a separate report, University of Colorado College of Business officials complained in early August that they were losing faculty members to better-endowed campuses. While top business schools can pay professors $120,000 to 150,000 a year, CU's average is closer to $60,000 a year.

Minority Recruitment Falters

(CPS) -- Despite efforts by most colleges and universities to attract and retain more minority students, few are successful, says "Campus Trends, 1989," a report from the American Council on Education (ACE).

Eight in ten administrators who responded to an ACE survey reported either "a lot" or "some" activity toward attracting and retaining minority students, but a paltry one in four said minority enrollment had gone up last year.

"It's encouraging that there's a tremendous level of activity," said Elaine El-Khawas, and ACE vice president and author of the report. "But the actual results fall short."

Expert Finds Cults Everywhere

(CPS) Dangerous religious cults are cropping up on college campuses, a cult expert has claimed.

"You may not think it's a problem on your campus, but you have it," warned Marcia Rudin, director of the International Cult Education Program in New York City.

Rudin initially made the claim July 21 at a meeting of the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators in Atlanta.

Cults -- from mind-controlling unconventional Christian organizations to violence-prone satanic groups -- "are still very much around on college campuses," she said.

"They're really a problem everywhere," Rudin told College Press Service, especially in the South and at affluent colleges, including Brown and George Mason universities.

That's news to Brown University officials, who said they couldn't recall any run-ins with cults for at least the past two years, said spokesman Mark Nickle.

Students Won't be Required to Serve

(CPS) -- Students may be encouraged to volunteer for some kind of "national service" job, but probably won't be required to do so in order to get financial aid for college, if a U.S. Senate compromise bill becomes law.

The compromise, adopted July 27 and due to be debated when senators return to Washington, D.C., later this fall, blends elements of several rival national service bills, but excludes Sen. Sam Nunn's (D-Ga.) proposal to force students to serve in the armed forces of a civilian volunteer corps to get college grants.

The compromise "includes the best features of all the bills, and the price tag is within realistic constraints," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) in sponsoring the bill.

The $530 million plan is designed to promote public service by offering incentives like academic credit, stipends, job training, educational aid and help for first-time home buyers.

At George Mason, though, university officials last spring denied a request by the Unification Church, affiliated with the Rev. Sun Myung Moon, to be recognized by the university.

"They said they had been formally recognized by other schools when they hadn't," said spokesman Daniel Walsch. "They said still come on campus, as can just about any group."

Rudin defined a cult as a group "exhibiting excessive devotion" to an idea and using "unethically manipulative techniques of persuasion and control."

She said the Hare Krishnas, some of the "churches of Christ," and the Unification Church, or the Moonies, are the most active "cults" on college campuses.

Campus Crusade for Christ, although known for its aggressive recruiting tactics, is honest, Rudin said. "As long as they're up-front and they don't use manipulative and deceitful tactics, we don't object," she added.

Cults aren't necessarily criminal, Rudin said. "No one wants to curb freedom of religion."

Travel: Safer in the '80's Any Way you Go

Americans are on the go in record numbers, but many don't realize that any way you travel, it's safer today than ever before, according to Transportation Secretary Jim Burnley. Stricter federal safety rules, enthusiastic grassroots safety movements and increasing industry efforts have given travelers in the U.S. the safest transportation systems in the world.

Federal Aviation Administration requirements for airplanes to have fire resistant seat cushions, improved flammability standards for cabin interiors, and fire resistant liners for baggage compartments increase survivability in case of a crash. Rules requiring on-board windshear detection equipment improve the odds against a crash ever occurring.

"These are just a sample of the Department of Transportation's commitment to achieving continued reductions in fatalities in the air, on our highways, railways and waterways," Burnley says. "Any transportation fatality is one too many."

From major airlines to small private planes, safety has improved in terms of number of accidents and number of fatalities. In the first nine months of 1988, near midair collision reports, air traffic controller errors, air fatality rates, flight delays and airline consumer complaints all declined significantly.

Airplane accidents, always a national media story, may seem like transportation's darkest tragedy—except to those who have lost a loved one in an auto crash, usually only reported in the local press. This media distinction may explain why some people still think it's safer to drive than fly.

Even on our highways, however, motorists enjoy an unprecedented level of safety. The highway fatality rate has dropped 25 percent since 1980, resulting in some 86,000 lives being saved.

Safety belt use has increased from 11 percent in the early '80s to 46 percent today, and 32 states and the District of Columbia have safety belt laws. All states have laws requiring child passenger safety seats. Drunk driving, the number one highway killer, has also declined 14 percent since 1982.

Major safety improvements in new cars have helped, too. By 1990, all new cars will be equipped with either air bags or automatic safety belts, as well as lap and shoulder belts in the rear.

In the 1980s, railroad accident rates dropped by two-thirds, led by even greater declines in the number of accidents due to faulty track and equipment.

Finally, the Coast Guard has kept safety of life and property at sea its primary mission, and the American merchant marine is the safest in the world.

"We must continue to work to cut the margin of error," Burnley concludes. "Whether it's riding the roads of drunk drivers or getting more people to use safety belts, or removing drug use from all forms of transportation, we can and will do more." ★

Blockade Runner Bringing Back Lumina

WILMINGTON—Bathing beauties, silent films and the big band sound will be joined with a classic 1950s sock hop Saturday, August 26, 1989, from 8:30 P.M. until midnight for the fourth annual Lumina Night at the Blockade Runner Resort Hotel. Tickets are $25.00 per person with the proceeds to be used for exhibits in the new museum.

Lumina, the "Fun Spot of the South," operated at the southern end of Wrightsville Beach between 1905 and 1973. The famed pleasure palace hosted the best big bands of the era and presented silent movies projected on an outside screen located in the surf.

It was as Lewis Phillip Hall said in his book Land of the Golden River, Volume I, "an ideal spot to take a girl on a moonlight night."

This year Lumina Night will feature the Joe Childers Band playing big band music in the Robert E. Lee Ballroom while a Rock-O-La juke box will fill the Nighthawk Room with classic hits from the 1950s. Other amenities include a swimsuits exhibit of Lumina bathing beauties, and hors d'oeuvre buffet, free coca-colas, a cash bar and a raffle.

Silent movies over the ocean will again be part of Lumina Night with favorites like The Great Train Robbery, The Bangville Police, and Felix in Fairyland to be shown. The silent movies are free.

Tickets are available at Belk Berry in Independence Mall, The Blockade Runner Resort Hotel, Wrightsville Beach and New Hanover County Museum, 814 Market Street.

Jim says Hi!

My Fellow Students,

As your Student Body President, let me take this moment to welcome you to UNCW, and wish you the best for a successful fall semester.

I'm happy to be back, seeing all my old friends and meeting new people as well. By becoming an active member of the Student Body, you too can have the chance to meet many new people. Elections will follow the beginning of classes with September 19th set as our election date. Registration for a position in Student Government will be held September 11-15. I would like to encourage those interested to run for an office.

This past Summer, SGA has taken a major role in the formation of a new tradition—Welcome Week '89. This event enables new students to become better oriented to UNCW and enhances our relationship with the Wilmington Community.

Student Government has many ideas in mind for this school year. If you have any ideas, contact me here in Room 200 of the University Union. I look forward to seeing you.

Sincerely,
Jim A. Humpries

Searching for Your Higher Ground

A recent song by an old favorite of mine, John Denver, begins: "There are those who can live with things they don't believe in. They are giving up their lives for something that is less than it can be."

The chorus responds to this with the affirmation: "Maybe it's just the dream in me. Maybe it's just my style. Maybe it's just the freedom that I have found. But given the possibilities of living up to the dream in me you know that I will be reaching for higher ground."

As I think about the thousands of you who are coming or returning to UNCW, I wonder how many of you come with any sense, any conscious awareness of the dilemma presented in this song. One of my deepest concerns is the large number of you who come to the university already equipped with limited and sometimes unconscious attitudes about self, about the world and its possibilities and about the values by which you operate. It finds you already on the course for a life that is "less than it can be". There seems to be an attitude prevalent where the only energy available is focused on getting through this day, this week, this semester or this year. And that does not leave much space for moving toward "higher ground".

As aware as I am of the consuming nature of the immediate tasks and responsibilities that tend to consume us day by day, I am also one that is absolutely convinced of the critical importance of identifying the dreams towards which we want to live our lives, the dreams that lead us to "higher ground". Where you are coming from, with all the values and the baggage that you bring with you, is important and powerful.

Just now is the time to begin to dream, to begin to decide where you want to go, to consciously wonder about and search for a vision of yourself and your future that is worthy of your very best effort and commitment.

The place to begin is with yourself, asking and reflecting on some questions: Who am I at this point in my life? What is important for me? Do I have friends who drag me down or call out the best in me? What would I like to change in the way that I operated day by day? What do I believe about the purpose of my life?

Investment of time and energy reflecting on questions like these can lead us to our vision of who we are meant to be and how we need to live into the future. Without a vision we are victims of values generated by others and to do so is to give your energy to "things you don't believe in."

But to choose your own dream, to create your own vision leads you into a life process that enables you to have an increasingly powerful inner sense of living "on higher ground."

I'm one whose life is very blessed. I am also a dreamer and I can look back on my life and see how one dream has led to another and this dream aspect another. I am fully overwhelmed with the sense of the goodness of God and my life. Of course there is struggle and confusion: none of us are free from that. But one thing you can be sure of is that "I'll be reaching for higher ground!"

My wish for you at the beginning of this year is that dream building will be an ongoing part of your university experience. I want you to be able to claim the chorus of this song as your own:

Maybe it's just the dream in me. Maybe it's just my style. Maybe it's just the freedom that I have found.

But given the possibilities of living up to the dream in me you know that I will be reaching for higher ground.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR

Welcoming You to the Jungle...

It's time. Gone are those long lovely days of lying around on the beach or kicking back in the air-conditioned comfort of home. For those whose summer was not so leisurely because of that dastardly plague known as employment... I know the feeling. For each of us alike, it is time to shift gears and re-enter the world of academia. The fall semester has arrived.

Welcome freshmen! You are about to embark on a journey like no other you will ever experience. You have already begun by entering the impenetrable jungle known as registration. After fighting your way through the initial thicket, you have gained entrance to the temple they call the "bookstore". Throngs of natives gather here to resist your entrance, but you win passage and crash through.

Suddenly, Seahawks assault you from all sides, leaping from tee-shirts, posters, coffee mugs, and more! Thus begins the search for the elusive textbook. After a battle royale, and with quarry in hand, you stalk the aisles in search of even more difficult game... an available cashier. Still awaiting joys and woes of university life? Here we go again? Well actually, those of you who read the Seahawk last year may see something new already. There is a new name beside the title of Editor-in-Chief on this column.

Gone is the old target of scorn, ridicule and ripe vegetables. You may now throw things at me.

you on your journey are homework and parking tickets, exams and parties, basketball games and parties, and, finally, grades and parties. In all, the next four months to ten years should prove quite interesting.

To you returning students, welcome home. What can I say to you who know only too well the Gone is the old target of scorn, ridicule, and ripe vegetables. You may now throw things at me.

Actually, I hope not to give you reason to throw anything. The Seahawk is, after all, the students' paper. With it we plan to reflect student attitudes and provide a forum for your collective voice, as well as inform and enlighten the readers. I encourage letters to this end; although you must understand that we cannot print every letter that crosses our threshold. It is equally important to realize that I will not give space to libelous or thoughtless slander. If you say someone is the slack-jawed result of multi-generational backwoods inbreeding, include a genealogy with your letter.

Well, I find myself in a very large desk with very little else to say. You will hear more from me before this year is through, and I hope to hear from some of you. I am open to constructive criticism and it is this criticism that will affect the course of your paper, the Seahawk. As this pointy-eared guy on T.V. once said, "Live long and prosper."

Taking Advantage of the Campus Police

Submitted by Hunter Davies

The UNCW Police Department is here to provide you with a safe place to live and learn while attending the University. The department's goal is to serve the campus community, students, faculty and staff. This article addresses University Police, one of two divisions of the Public Safety Department.

The staff is made up of 15 sworn Police Officers and approximately 20 non-sworn telecommunications and security guards. All Police Officers are certified law enforcement officers with full powers of arrest and authorization to carry firearms.

Police Officers enforce North Carolina laws, infractions and University rules and regulations. Security Guards are not sworn law enforcement officers, but are responsible for enforcing University rules and regulations. The Police Department offers a variety of services to students and staff.

First the Seahawk Express is an escort shuttle service designed to provide safe cross campus transportation for students at night. The shuttle operates Sunday through Thursday 6:00 - 12:00 P.M., Friday 6:00 - 9:00 p.m., individuals may receive escorts by calling the University Police at 395-3184.

Secondly, Operation ID and Bicycle Registration are both programs which document ownership of your property. Bicycles may be registered FREE at the UNCW Police Office. You may also borrow an engraving tool to rich your state abbreviation and driver's license number on other valuables. This simple task makes your property identifiable by police departments across the nation in the event it is stolen.

Also, if you have a dead battery or are locked out of your car, motorist assistance is only a phone call away. A police officer can jumpstart your car and unlock many vehicles.

Self-defense classes are available free of charge by the Police Department. The Crime Prevention Division of the University Police Department provides officer programs to educate students and staff about prevention, protection, safety and awareness.

This year the Police Department will even pay you to take advantage of their new program. The Seahawk Crime Line, 395-6669, pays rewards for criminal information and the caller remains anonymous.

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington's police Department is always working to help make your college experience most enjoyable and crime free. Chief Billy Dawson will be glad to host any questions or comments you might have. If you need assistance do not hesitate to call the UNCW Police Office Non-Emergency 395-3184, dial "911" for Emergencies or use the Seahawk Crime Line - 395-6669.

LOOK, MARCIE, I WROTE THIS GREAT PAPER ON GEORGE WASHINGTON AND ALL I GOT WAS A 'D' MINUS!

THE PAPER WAS SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN ON WASHINGTON, D.C., SIR.

WHO WAS THAT, HIS SON? WHAT DOES D.C. STAND FOR, DONALD CHARLES?

"DONALD CHARLES WASHINGTON" FUNNY, I NEVER HEARD OF HIM.

HI, CHUCK... GUESS WHAT.

SO FAR THIS YEAR I'VE GOTTEN TWENTY 'D' MINUSES' IN A ROW.

I DON'T KNOW WHAT TO DO...

MAYBE I SHOULD STOP GOING FOR THE LONG BALL.

IT'S A PHILOSOPHY, SIR...

IT SAYS THAT IF YOU DENY SOMETHING EXISTS, THEN IT DOESN'T EXIST.

SORRY, MA'AM.

YOUR 'D' MINUSES' DON'T EXIST!

Dear Ex-Sweetheart, I still think of you often.

I loved you more than life itself, but you turned me down.

So why am I writing to you?

I'M NOT!

Dear Ex-Sweetheart, How did I love thee? Let me count the ways.

How do I forget thee?

Let me count the ways.

I'm up to nine hundred.

THERE'S A GUN AT SCHOOL WHO KEEPS ASKING ME TO GO OUT WITH HIM.

HE'S VERY GOOD LOOKING! HE HAS BLOND HAIR AND BLUE EYES...

I JUST MIGHT GO OUT WITH HIM. I'D LIKE TO MEET A DECENT GUN SOMEDAY.

I DON'T THINK I'M GOING TO PAY FOR HER LOBSTER.

AND THEN THERE'S TOM. HE'S REALLY CUTE AND HAS A NICE PERSONALITY!

I MUST BE OUT OF MY MIND!! EVERY TIME I TAKE YOU OUT, ALL YOU EVER DO IS TALK ABOUT OTHER GUYS!

HOW RUDE!! I MAY BE A LITTLE INSECURE, BUT I CERTAINLY HAVE MORE CLASS THAN YOU'VE EVER KNOWN!! I DON'T NEED THIS!!

COME ON! I'M TAKING YOU HOME! I THINK I'M IN LOVE!

YOU SHOULD'VE BEEN THERE, JANET! I WAS TALKING ABOUT MY OTHER PREFERENCES, AND NORMAN FINALLY JUST BLEW UP AT ME!

HE BECAME REALLY FIRM AND FIRMER. AND I STARTED TO BECOME ATTRACTED TO HIM!

HE SAID I WAS RUDE, CONCEITED, AND RATHER IGNORANT!

IT WAS WONDERFUL!

Hawks add new recruits

From staff reports

Head Coach Marilyn Christoph is adding new recruits to the women's basketball team. Sylvia Crumpler (Cape Fear HS/ Fayetteville, N.C.), Paulette Mack (Middletown HS/ Charleston, S.C.), Alexia Moffitt (Hickory HS/ Hickory, N.C.) and Patti Ryan (Athens Drive HS/ Raleigh, N.C.) Lady Hawks gain new assistants for '89-90 campaign. Darci Wilson, a former player at UNCW and basketball coach at American University last year joins the Hawks in the quest for a winning season. She hopes that based on her experience under Coach Christoph she can adjust easier and be able to relate to the girls on a more personal level.

Seahawk briefs

Reggie Veney is fourth new recruit to help the Hawks rebuild after losing 59% of the offensive output to graduation. All-CAA Larry Houser (16.9 ppg.), Antonio Howard (17.5 ppg.) along with Greg Bender and Ed Chensery will provide some big holes to fill for the Hawks. Veney a 6-1 guard joins Jason Moore (Everett HS/Lansing, MI), Wayne Morris (E.E. Smith/ Fayetteville, N.C.), Tim Shaw (South View HS/ Fayetteville, N.C.). "Reggie can come in and give us depth at the point guard position. He very quick defensively, and is an outstanding passer," said head coach Robert McPherson. Former Seahawk pitchers signed major league contracts after the professional draft. Tommie Adams who posted a 9-3 mark in his final season with the Hawks penned a free-agent pact with the Atlanta Braves organization and is playing with the Braves farm team in Bradenton, Florida. Tony Tillman who was selected in the 27th round by the Cleveland Indians is currently playing with the Burlington Indians in the Appalachian League.

Coaches are not the only recruiters

Welcome back and all of that other seasonal garbage that everyone says yet hardly ever means. For the wide-eyed freshman, I hope your five years here are spent in utter bliss.

This is more-or-less a recruiting column, whereby I will attempt to portray Seahawk sports in such an overwhelming light that it would be nearly impossible for anyone with pen in hand not to come beating down my door in search of a position on my staff.

There are a variety of sports from which you may choose, including club football (last year's team received about as much coverage as your typical mud wrastlin' match at Country Music USA). Last year's squad defeated Carolina, Duke and N.C. State—no silly, not the varsity football teams, but regardless still pretty impressive wins.

That is merely the top of Don King's forever flowing hair. There is also an opening for girls' tennis. Yes, you do actually have to go see them play once in awhile, but they do have away matches which can be taken quite easily over the phone.

There is an additional need in the area of soccer, although you may have to fight it out with my assistant, whose sole passion is soccer. And there is always someone complaining about the total lack of awareness I demonstrated toward last year's surfing team. Frankly, unless someone specifically asks to cover this beat, it will continue to go as unnoticed as ever. I don't surf; I can't understand why anyone would want to, but most importantly, as boring as the hobby sounds, I can't imagine it being anymore exciting in print. I could be wrong, and I will gladly afford someone the opportunity to prove me wrong.

Seriously, I would like to see surfing covered, it's just that I don't know enough about it to write it properly. To me hangin' ten simply means something Micheal Jordan does after finishing off a high-flying, vicious, 360-slam.

Which brings me to that other sport. Basketball. Unfortunately that season is still seemingly light years away, but to tide us over we have volleyball. Volleyball is perhaps the most energetic sport this school has to offer. Last year's team was simply fantastic; the crowds were insane, and the victories were plentiful—everything you could ask for in a sport. The only thing missing was recognition. I covered two games, but they deserved more.

This year I would like to see front-page caliber material for every sport, for every game. If you feel motivated, understand sports and write fairly well, ok, if you just write, then by all means, stop in and see us. I did the very same thing last year.

George to pace Hawks

From staff reports

Despite the loss of midfielder David Cresswell, UNCW's 1989 varsity soccer team should be fairly competitive, according to fourth-year head coach Jackie Blackmore.

"I'd like to think we'll be pretty good this year," Blackmore said. "Our biggest problem is going to be leadership. We need someone to step forward and take charge on the field."

That someone will most likely be junior striker Chris George, an All-CAA performer last year who led the Seahawks in virtually every offensive category.

George accounted for over a third of the offense last season, including 13 goals and four assists.

"Chris is going to get his goals," Blackmore said. "In order to improve from last year's record of 3-4, we need to find someone else to give us balance with five or ten goals this year."

Presumably, that scoring will come from junior's Greg Diamond and Dean Marnell, the two top returnees.

"We had some good technical players in the mid-field last year, but they didn't have the mobility I thought they should have," Blackmore said. "I'd like to have players with good touch and technique as well as more mobility in the mid-field this year."

Defensively, the Hawk's return goalie John Pinter, who started all 17 games last season and recorded three shutouts.

"John was brilliant early last season," Blackmore said. "He did everything we asked him to do. He's a very solid keeper."

UNCW opens their season on Sept. 4 when they entertain

Charleston College at Brooks Field at 1 p.m.

Junior Chris George will be the leading the Hawks

American cyclist can not follow guidelines

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Beep.... Ladies and Gentlemen we interrupt your boring regular schedule welcome back crap to bring you an important sports article that actually is entertaining to read.

Over the summer I've witnessed an event that has happened only two times in 75 years and I'm not referring to the passage of Halley's Comet. An American cyclist, Greg LeMond, has won the premier cycling race. He has captured the Tour de France title. Cycling?, you ask; what's so difficult about riding a bike? Nothing, if you consider climbing mountain paths that range from 3,000 to 8,000 feet in altitude easy.

Maybe you would prefer the 60 miles-per-hour descents where one wrong turn can send you airborne. There are also the speed time trials and long 135 mile flatland runs. OK, now we have established that there is more to this sport than just pedaling. Still, why has an American only won the Tour twice (LeMond won it in 1986, and again this year).

That's where I come in. I have put a lot of thought in it. After five minutes of strenuous mind power I have come up with 20 reasons why we can't win this event.

- 1) The name of the race is screwed up. Tour de France translates Tour of France in english. We thought it was a vacation trip, not a race.
- 2) We can't speak French.
- 3) There is no Micky D's on the route
- 4) Too many wine breakfasts, lunches, and dinners
- 5) Girls, Girls, Girls that do the Can Can Can.

- 6) Real Americans don't eat croissants
- 7) Bo doesn't do it.
- 8) Can't fold those stupid road maps.
- 9) European mountains are over the size limit.
- 10) Did I mention the wine?
- 11) Domino's doesn't deliver.
- 12) Designated rider rule not in effect
- 13) Victory dances and high fives are not allowed after the finish line.

14) Who wants to endorse French perfume?

15) Sturpiles (American Team 7-11) melt in the hot sun.

16) Donald Trump can't buy it.

17) Girls, wine, girls—I did mention that.

18) You don't get to go to Disneyworld.

19) Rap videos are frowned on.

20) Who would want to pedal 2,000 miles when it would be much easier to drive, anyway?

OVERMAN TO TEACH MEMORY COURSE

"Improve Your Memory Skills," a basic skills course designed for participants to remember names, telephone numbers and other important facts, will be taught by Dr. William Overman, professor of psychology, as part of the fall series of general public classes sponsored by UNC Wilmington's Office of Special Programs. Specific memory techniques include visual imagery, link and peg to help students remember large amounts of information for long periods of time.

The class meets Wednesday and Thursday, October 11 and 12 from 7:00-8:30 PM on the UNCW campus. The $30 regular fee will be discounted to $25 for registration by September 26. Registration deadline is October 3.

To register by credit card or for more information, contact the Office of Special Programs, 295-3578.

SHINN, WAXMAN TO DISCUSS RELATIONSHIP OF OLD & NEW TESTAMENT

When Jesus quoted scripture, He quoted from the Old Testament. Dr. Gerald Shinn, professor of philosophy and religion at UNCW and Rabbi Robert Waxman of B'Nai Israel Synagogue, will delve into this "Relationship of the Old and New Testaments" in a course offered through UNCW's Office of Special Programs. The course will examine Old Testament sources that are quoted in the New Testament, what these sources meant originally and how the New Testament writers reinterpreted them. The class meets on Mondays, October 16-November 20 from 8:00-9:30 PM on the UNCW campus. The $35 regular fee will be discounted to $30 for enrollment by October 2. Registration deadline is October 9.

For more information or to register by credit card, call the Office of Special Programs, 395-3578.

NO GLASS SLIPPERS HERE

BY E. ALLEN RAY
Entertainment Editor

Hard rock fans in Wilmington were treated to some down and dirty, bluesy, rock and roll by internationally known Cinderella Friday night in Trask Coliseum. Cinderella, just back from a drug awareness concert in Moscow where they played with Ozzy Osbourne, Bon Jovi, Scorpions, Motley Crue, and Aerosmith, played an hour and forty-five minute set to a very enthusiastic crowd.

The band opened their set with lead singer Tom Keifer taking the stage alone with nothing but a steel guitar and harmonica. Cinderella then kicked into high gear going through songs off their current album Long Cold Winter such as...Gypsy Rose, Don't Know What You Got (Til it's gone), and Take Me Back. They also played such hits as Nobody's Fool, and Shake Me from their first album Night Songs.

From the first minute they took stage you could tell why Cinderella was the headline act. Cinderella took control of the sellout crowd of 6,000 and played as much to the crowd as they did for them. Lead singer Tom Keifer led each side of the coliseum against the other in a contest to see who could sing the chorus to Gypsy Rose the loudest.

This set the stage for drummer Fred Curry to work the crowd after his five minute drum solo. The crowd, one of the loudest ever at Trask, devoured everything the band had to offer, in fact one concert goer got so excited that he felt the urge to run on stage and tackle Tom Keifer during one of the encores. The last of the many highlights of the evening was when all three bands took the stage to do covers of Jumpin' Jack Flash and Sweet Home Alabama.

The only real criticism of the entire show was that there was enough sound equipment to rock the Charlotte Coliseum, let alone Trask. The first few songs of each set were so loud that they were indistinguishable from one another.

In a telephone interview with Cinderella's drummer Fred Curry prior to Friday's show, he spoke of his musical training, how Cinderella got their start, the band's musical style, their current tour, and the recent drug awareness concert in Moscow.

Fred Curry is not your usual rock-a-roll drummer. He started his musical career not playing the drums, but at the American Music Conservatory in Lebanon studying the classical violin for three years.

When he moved back to Philadelphia he got into Cinderella and was playing in a local club when a man named Jon Bon Jovi came back stage. "When he came back stage he told us how hot he thought we were... we were like, 'great'. Who the hell was that?" They soon knew who he was because he came back with a record contract for the young band.

On the road for over a year supporting their current album Cinderella has toured with such bands as Judas Priest, AC/DC, and even Bon Jovi. With only 30 shows to go before the band will take a much needed rest, they almost had to cancel the rest of the tour. Tom Keifer's voice blew out at a concert in Baltimore 3 days before the show here.

ON CAMPUS CHILD CARE

BY SANDY PORTER
Staff Writer

A new trend in the business world is fast becoming an essential to the employee's and students of UNCW. This is the trend of corporate day care, where the employer provides adequate child care at the place of business for its employees. The problem of on campus child care may well prove to be the premiere issue of the 1990's at UNCW.

Several Universities throughout America already provide quality and child care at affordable prices. Michigan State was one of the first to offer on campus child. San Diego University also pioneered referral child care on its campus.

UNCW's Kathy Berkley, of the History Department, took advantage of this program while teaching at San Diego. She felt the experience was good for her child since the nursery was nearby and she could still nurse the baby whenever needed. Dr. Berkley stated, "I'm glad child care was provided at San Diego. It did not feel like total separation from my child and that was really important to me."

Dr. Berkley was disappointed when her family moved to Wilmington and could not find adequate child care in the surrounding area. The Berkley's were not satisfied with the more commercial child care centers in town. "They're too far away. And the ratio was one adult to twelve children compared to the one to four ratio at San Diego," said Dr. Berkley.

She feels child care at UNCW should be given as a benefit to the faculty, staff, and non-traditional students. "This is a major issue for working people, you should be able to pay for child care just as you pay for health care."

A former secretary turned student, Barbara Christmas also sees the need of child care at UNCW. "There is a definite need, not only for the faculty and staff, but for the students also. There are a number of residents in the community who would like to take classes, but due to child care problems they are unable," stated Ms. Christmas. She feels students majoring in the School of Education could help staff the center and gain hands on experience while offering the service at a reasonable cost.

Jacquie Skinner, Assistant Dean of Students, has had several students in the past come to her concerned that their children had no on campus services provided for them. Ms. Skinner gave insight into the problem, "child care in the community is extremely limited. This is an unseen problem at UNCW which must be solved."

According to Skinner, many times frustrated students would come to [her office] unload their problems. "They all wanted to complete school, but were unable due to the lack of affordable child care provided locally. Of course I could do nothing but be supportive."

CLASSES CLOSED

BY MAI NGUYEN
News Editor

"Closed? What do you mean closed, I really need to take this class! You mean I have to rearrange my whole schedule if I want to take it at another time?"

Has this ever happened to you? Well, for several students this fall it has been a long circuitous path to finally obtaining a schedule adequate for their needs. They have been subjected to the "drop-add" obstacle course in order to obtain the classes necessary. This fall it has become increasingly difficult to counter the growing demand for more classes due to the substantial rise in student population.

In the fall of 1988, approximately 6594 students attended UNCW on a full and part-time basis. Rough estimates for this fall put the student population at approximately 7043 as of August 31, 1989.

The primary problem that the university must contend with is the lack of space. According to the department of Institutional Research, many changes have been made in order to accommodate the changes in programs and population. One such change is the expansion of Bear Hall which was completed earlier this year. This increase in space has highly benefited the math and computer science department.

The natural sciences, however, have had to cope with a limited amount of laboratory space and equipment. According to a spokesman for the Biology department, "Labs are really a limiting factor, we've had to schedule as many as 17 labs in one room." One problem generated by limited laboratory room is a lack of preparation time. Since several of the labs are scheduled consecutively, it has been difficult to amply prepare the materials needed for the next class.

One sophomore source remarked, "The labs fill up so fast that it is extremely necessary to create more lab courses to coincide with the lectures." For sophomore Sonia Henderson, an accounting major, it has been with ease that she has scheduled her classes. She comments, "I have not had any problems with signing up for my classes, although I am a firm believer that the school does need to be enlarged." Richelle Mause, a sophomore, adds, "the art classes are very difficult to get into."

Undoubtedly, the growing number of students has caused the administration to make several changes. An obvious change made by the system is the addition of several new professors to the faculty. Dr. Ronald Sizemore, the Biology Department Chairman remarked, "The administration has been very helpful [in facilitating class organization]." Since the student population is projected to increase considerably over the next few years, many more plans are being designed to suitably cope with the expansion.

ACTIVITIES FAIR

BY MAI NGUYEN
News Editor

On Wednesday, September 6, the Student Activities Office and the Union for Leadership Development organized the Students Activities Fair in an effort to increase student awareness of the services of the university as well as the community. Local community services, Greek organizations, and a few businesses gathered around the Student Union to promote interest in their respective groups. The tables on which informational materials were placed were adorned with stacks of brochures, collages and free promotional gifts (cups, candies).

One of the purposes of the fair was to allow a few of the local businesses to advertise their services. Spokespersons from the Fitness Center and Planter's Bank expounded on their utilities.

Another aim of the fair was for Greek organizations, local volunteer services and other registered university organizations to recruit new members. The American Red Cross, Family Services Northside Center, and Big Buddy, who offer much needed community services, were also present to enlist volunteers.

Other organizations whose members attended the fair included the Ambassadors of UNCW, SGA, Campus Crusade and Smooth Talkers Toastmasters Club.

Student body president Jim Humphries attributes the great success of the event to the change in location. Most of the tables were located outside the right wing of the Student Union, making them highly visible and accessible to the flow of passersby. In previous years, tables were located in front of the Union.

Sophomore Lauren Fuller comments, "It was a great opportunity for the students of UNCW to learn much about the services offered by the university and also to meet the different people in the community."

Organizers Cathy Birmingham and Lanita Hansen who work for the Leadership Center and Student Activities Offices respectively, deserve much credit for their efforts in the fair. The groups who participated in the affair also deserve thanks for the great success.

Campus Police stayed busy last week as parking regulations came into effect. Many students are unhappy about new regulations.

Beach Bash

BY PHILLIP LOUGHLIN
EDITOR IN CHIEF

Parents of UNCW freshmen and sophomores will have a chance to return to school next month when University Advancement and the UNCW Parents' Association holds their First Parent's Beach Bash.

"I want this to be a day at college for them," said Howard Lipman, Executive Director of Resource Development. The event, planned for the weekend of October 6-7, will give parents the opportunity to sample what goes on in today's classrooms and see where their child's tuition and fees are being channeled. The students in turn, will be able to introduce their parents to their friends and show them around the campus and surrounding areas. The schedule of events is designed to allow time to see Riverfest which will also take place on that weekend.

Entire blocks of hotel rooms have been reserved in anticipation of the needs of visiting folks, and many area restaurants will be offering special coupons to student/parent diners. Brochures containing details of costs and arrangements were mailed to parents earlier. A booklet entitled A Parent's Guide to The University of North Carolina was also sent. The booklet contains information about various aspects of University organizations and services. According to Lipman, the booklet's primary purpose is to serve as a telephone resource. "They can keep this by the phone. If they have a problem or a question, the number to call will be right here."

During the event, student ambassadors will play host and guide as the visitors are shown around the campus. There will even be an opportunity for parents to attend a class session. The planned highlight of the weekend will be a shrimperoo on Saturday afternoon. Live music will be provided by the band North Tower as parents and students gorge on all the food they can eat.

"It's going to be a lot of fun," said Lipman. "Urge your parents to attend."

Good Grades For UNCW Nurses

(UNCW NEWS)-- One hundred percent of the 1989 nursing graduates of The University of North Carolina at Wilmington who took the N.C. Board of Nursing examination have passed, earning the designation Registered Nurse which allows them to practice nursing.

Of the 1989 graduating class of 18, 15 took and passed the test administered July 11-12 in Raleigh. Three UNCW nursing graduates were already registered nurses who returned to university to earn the baccalaureate degree.

This latest 100 percent pass rate brings the young school's record to two perfect years out of three. Last year's class scored 95 percent.

"With the university system schools of nursing under scrutiny by the board of governors, it is especially gratifying to see our students consistently performing so well," said UNCW Chancellor William H. Wagoner. "As we build our nursing program, our primary concern is always to provide a high quality education for our students and to graduate high quality nurses for the state's health care system. I compliment the dean and faculty for establishing and maintaining high standards."

Dr. Marlene M. Rosenkoetter, dean of the UNCW School of Nursing, commented that having a 100 percent pass rate on board exams is "indicative of the exceptional quality of the graduates and the outstanding program and faculty. These latest scores give UNCW more than a 98 percent average for the three years we have had a baccalaureate program," she said.

The School of Nursing at UNC Wilmington was established in 1984 when the baccalaureate degree in nursing began, and the first baccalaureate class was graduated in 1987 following the phasing out of the two-year associate degree program. The school is fully approved by the North Carolina Board of Nursing and fully accredited by the National League for Nursing.

Special Feature: Our Environment in Danger

BY L. MICHAEL O'BRYAN
Contributing writer

We have all heard at least something in the past few years about the ozone layer. But the widespread destruction of the ozone and the great "hole" over the South Pole may have much greater effects on our species than many students realize.

Ozone, O<sub>3</sub>, covers most of the planet, protecting its surface from the sun's ultraviolet-B light (UV-B) by reflecting it back into space. Chlorofluorocarbons, CFC's used today and for years in the past are primarily responsible for the depletion of ozone that we now see. CFC's have a wide range of both commercial and industrial applications including: insulation, aerosol propellants, refrigerants, and fire extinguishers.

These CFC's are released into the atmosphere and they slowly, "migrate," to the protective ozone layer. This is where the problem starts. One molecule of a CFC, whether released from an aerosol can, or a car air conditioner, can destroy up to 100,000 molecules of ozone. CFC's, however, are not the only ozone depleting substances in widespread use. Methyl chloroform and carbon tetrachloride, which are used in cleaners and degreasers, have also been recently found to destroy ozone.

The time for change is upon us, and it's sad to note that the two things most necessary to bring about this change are two that are very difficult to find; massive amounts of money, and a massive change in the way people passively act about their environment.

The time for change is upon us...
It's sad to note that the things most necessary to change are very difficult to find...

The Montreal Protocol was signed by thirty countries in 1987 and mandated that CFC production be cut in half by 1988. It is clear now though that even this reduction will not stop the depletion, or the increase in damage that exposure to UV-B creates.

A one percent increase in the amount of UV-B allowed to hit the Earth's surface will result in a five percent increase in the reports of malignant skin cancer. Increased UV-B radiation will also have serious impacts on vegetation and agriculture.

A twenty-five percent ozone depletion has been shown to effect a twenty percent decrease in the yield of some important cereal grain and fiber crops. UV-B breaks apart some important biological molecules including DNA. This factor will also have an especially detrimental effect on aquatic life.

UV-B will reduce the net productivity of phytoplankton which is the base of the entire marine food chain, and that reduction has a multiplicative effect on higher species.

Food is essential to our living, and if we continue destroying the ozone layer which effects the food chain, then we will cease to continue surviving. It is necessary and vital that everyone participate in the "clean up" of our air.

Michael O'Bryan is a senior majoring in Marine Biology at UNCW.

Voyager... A Look at Distant Worlds

BY HOLLY PRICE
Staff Writer

Live transmissions from the Voyager II's journey near Neptune and daily news reports from NASA's Blue Room were sent via satellite into Randall Library's auditorium last week on the school's new satellite dish. The dish was purchased this year by the UNCW Special Programs Department and made its debut with the Neptune presentation.

Starting August 22nd and running through the 26th, NASA had a news conference every day updating the Voyager II's progress. Actual pictures of Neptune's surface and Triton, Neptune's largest moon were shown in the auditorium. At noon each day there was a brief broadcast, followed at 1:00 p.m. by a NASA news conference. Pictures of Neptune and Triton could be viewed from 2:00pm until the library closed.

"The community as well as some students have shown a pretty good turn out," said Dr. Brian Davis of UNCW's Physics department. Dr. Davis spent much of his time last week helping and arranging the transmissions program from the library.

Dr. Davis, like many of us, wondered what the Voyager II would find. Launched in 1977, the probe has spent the last twelve years and 4.4 billion miles in space. It has already flown by Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus. Some of the things scientists were looking for during the flight were characteristics of Neptune and Triton. They also searched for new rings and moons around the planet. Of further interest to researchers was planetary phenomena such as lightning and radio emissions.

Voyager II's closest encounter with Neptune came at 5:10 a.m. on Friday August 25th. At this time scientists were able to observe the planet more closely. Two bright rings around the planet had already been seen by scientists, and three new ones were discovered during this voyage. Six tiny objects, thought to be moonlets, were also found in one of Neptune's brightest rings. Of great interest to the scientists was active volcanic action on Triton's surface. Several natural gases, most notably nitrogen, were also found in the atmosphere of Triton. The Voyager II is now speeding, out of our galaxy and on into others.

UNCW plans to make great use of the satellite dish in the future. An agenda for programs is now in the process of being formed. The students as well as the community will greatly benefit from this addition to our campus.

Walk The Tight Rope With Alternatives!

By Sandy Errante
Coordinator, Alternatives!

"I am not going up there... I am not going to do that." Colleen Dougherty gazed up at the wire suspended between two tall hardwoods 45 feet in the air and shook her head. She was taking part in the New Horizons Ropes Course, an outdoor adventure experience very similar to Outward Bound in concept, and was being asked to overcome her fear of heights, push herself to her personal best, and succumb to positive peer pressure.

All eyes on her, Colleen hesitatingly looked at her peers, who having just climbed this tree, walked the wire and taken a flying leap into the air and down to the ground via a "zip line", were flushed with excitement and exhaustion and giddy with the "natural high" they had just experienced.

"O.K. I'll try it..." As she hoisted up her safety belt and clipped into the belay line, the group of Alternatives! Peer Advisors urged her on with words of encouragement and reassuring pats on the back. Fifteen minutes later Colleen had completed the event and was back on the ground with advice for the group. "I am so glad I did that! If I can do it, anybody can. I know I can do anything I set my mind to now." The New Horizons Ropes Course, owned and operated by Cape Fear Substance Abuse Center is an "obstacle course" located in the heart of some nearby Wilmington woods. The events on the course are designed to promote group bonding, teamwork, communication skills, problem-solving skills, and heightened self-esteem.

Participants find themselves faced with challenges all day long that must be overcome with total cooperation. Many discover the impact of peer pressure and most are amazed at their personal accomplishments.

As advocates for "drug-free" fun, the Alternatives! Program (UU 104, 395-3653) is helping to sponsor University organizations and clubs that would like to accept the challenge of the New Horizons Ropes Course experience. If a group is interested in signing up, they must first come by Alternatives! to pick up a $100.00 voucher to be used toward the total payment ($200) of the course and information on reservation procedures.

Each UNCW group (10-12 persons) will be responsible for scheduling their own Ropes Course date and an orientation session directly with Cape Fear Substance Abuse Center. The Jane Addison prepares for a 45 foot drop on the rope slide.

Alternatives! voucher must be presented to the facilitator of the course on the day of the event. This will ensure that Alternatives! is billed for one half of the charge and the UNCW group billed for the other half.

Many UNCW organizations have already experienced the Ropes the companies themselves operating these centers. Companies are offering discounts, vouchers/subsidies, and salary reduction agreements to subsidize outside child care chosen by the parent-employee.

Still another service that employers can offer their employees is referrals on local child care centers. UNC-Chapel Hill recently hired Betty E. Boling full time for referral work. This service allows university parents to find day care slots quickly.

Aida Toplin of the Modern Language Department has continued concern into the problem of no child care at UNCW. Toplin is a member of AAUP (American Association of University Professors). As a spokesperson for this association

Ms. Toplin says the state and national AAUP has placed child care as their main issue to discuss this year.

Toplin also added, "I think it is sad that good students and faculty numbers are lost due to the fact that adequate and affordable day care is not provided on 'campus'."

Ms. Toplin is helping to organize an informational meeting to be held on campus sometime in the latter part of September for anyone interested on the subject of an campus child care.

Faculty, staff and non-traditional students are invited to come and share information and decide what action, if any, to take in the way of child care at UNCW.

Care cont...

Last year Ms. Skinner had a non-traditional student who tried to "set up a day care task force on campus. Unfortunately, support from the faculty was virtually non-existent.

Daycare on campus would solve many worries and headaches for the professors and non-traditional students at UNCW. But if child care was provided would it be worth anything to the administration? Many experts seem to think so. Employers benefit from supporting child care in reduced turnover and absenteeism, and improved employee morale and productivity.

Among psychologists there seems to be a consensus that child care programs and facilities have a positive influence on both the child and parent. They feel that employees who have solved their child care problems are free to devote their professional efforts to the job.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics found that employer-supported child care centers had become available in 25,000 of the Nation's public and private sector workplaces. The key motivator has been the widespread agreement in business, industry and finance that the recruitment of good workers is a real concern.

Since child care helps attract and keep employees, management has been prompted to act. Employers are beginning to provide child care centers, either on-site or nearby with parents or

Is Jim Making a Mistake?

By CELESTE BULLLEY
Contributing Writer

It might be early in the school year, but it seems at least one of our student leaders has found the time to make a potentially monumental error in judgement.

Jim Humphries, our newly elected student body president, purchased an unnecessary and costly toy for himself this summer: a Macintosh Computer and ImageWriter printer. The catch is, he bought it with your money.

The computer was bought with student government funds which should have been diverted to the clubs who had requested money in the spring semester but were rejected. In fact, the group Atlantis (a creative arts magazine published each spring) requested a Macintosh for themselves—the bulk of their work is poetry and short stories—and they were denied.

The fact is, Humphries does not need a computer. He has an office secretary who is paid to type his correspondence, and there was a computer available for his use in the SGA office.

It might be even marginally more forgivable if he had purchased a cheaper system, but at a total cost of over $2000, it was hardly pocket change. And if he plans to interface his Macintosh to the existing system, it'll be another couple hundred.

Humphries defended his purchase with "well, Karla [Alston, former SGA president] had allotted for it in her budget, but never ordered it."

That is completely irrelevant. Regardless of the source of the money, it still could have been used to fund Atlantis, who currently has to use the Seahawk computers or (worse) the Macintoshes in the library.

The Seahawk even offered our LaserWriter printer for his use if SGA would buy the connection cable, but he declined, favoring the ImageWriter which he couldn't even quote a price on at the first SGA meeting. When asked it's cost, he replied, "I'm not sure. Kirky [Moore, the SGA treasurer] has the figures."

She, in fact, could not recall the price of the printer either. She said, "it was between $500 and $800."

It is a gross abuse of power and finances when you can spend a couple hundred dollars and not remember exactly how much a major purchase was. And if they do not consider it a major purchase, the student body is being cheated, for that $2000 could have gone to a club which would have given the students something grand for the money, not just the student body president handing in extra clean papers.

If you have any comments on the parking situation (no, not about how there aren't any parking spaces, but about how inconvenient the new decals are, write a letter to the editor this week.

We think the students should have been consulted on the form of the parking stickers, as now they aren't stickers at all, and are subject to being stolen anywhere in town or at the beach when your windows rolled down or your car's unlocked.

Dear Students,

Hello and welcome back to school. It was an interesting summer, wasn't it? Exxon managed to totally bungle the clean up of the Alaskan oil spill, and because of a public outcry Exxon's profits were cut by 85%.

Also, there was the massacre of students at Tinsmen Square, and because of public outcry, the President denounced the action. I don't know exactly what causes public outcry, but there needs to be more of it. We have three million homeless in this country, we have dozens of inner-city kids who become hooked on dope every day, and countless other problems.

Where is the public outcry on these issues? Many of you ask "What can I do to help?" All of you have one thing with which you can help donate...YOUR TIME. There are many on-campus organizations you can join, such as SADD, the LivWell/Alternatives Center, Alpha Phi Omega, the Campus Awareness Organization, etc.

There are also tons of organizations off campus; if you want a list you can contact the Cape Fear Area United Way. Also many of you belong to clubs, get your clubs and organizations involved in the volunteer effort. Most of all just get involved, someone will appreciate it.

People always talk about being a senior. "Its prestigious", they say. "Its good to know you only have two more semesters," they say. Well, I finally made it. It took me five years and a case and a half of Tylenol but by God, I'm finally a senior.

And while standing in line to shell out the fifty for our new and improved parking decals, I realize what the most important aspect of being a senior is.

Unlike the hundreds of new students at this college, I finally understand all of the procedures that go with registering and enrolling. I've even got the Post Office and parking situation under control.

As I stood in my line with my new senior knowledge, I noticed twenty or so freshmen waiting to get their ID pictures taken. "Their coming their hair," I thought, as I stared in disbelief. One even asked to borrow a comb. "Sorry buddy, I left mine by the styling gel." He didn't look amused.

But by far the most ridiculous thing the youth of the school engage in is the asking of unbelievable questions. To ask one absurd question is a privilege of the human race, yet there are those who take advantage of it.

I'm used to stupid questions since I check IDs at a local club. Once a lovely young girl handed me a College meal card and asked if it would get her in. "Sugar, I said. (One can afford to be chauvinistic when they possess such power.) "This doesn't even have a birth date on it." "Do you need to have one on the ID?" the poor child asked. I sat speechless for a moment, marked her underage, and whisked her down the stairs.

And compared to some of the questions I have heard in room 100 of the Union, this girl could have been a Rhodes Scholar. By far the most incredible request that I have ever heard is the girl who came up to the administrator and asked for a new post office box. "Mine has a hole in the back," she whined.

Ahhhhh! With these people in my high school, Valedictorian would have been a cinch.

And those poor administrative personnel. The same people who I swore at and wished mean things on four years ago, now I pity. How those in charge of operations can deal with it, I'll never quite understand. I have noticed that sales in Turns and Rolands tend to go up about the same time every year. Maybe there is a connection.

One poor assistant was at her wit end in dealing with the ID situation. She told a freshman to check all of the information on her card before she had her picture made. The student came up with checkmarks by her name, number and birthdate. And the stories just go on and on.

The really great thing about being a senior is that you start looking at the new students with a sense of authority and helpfulness. Hopefully, You begin to realize that it wasn't too long ago that you were in their shoes on the first day of college. Maybe you were just as scared and confused.

There is no way, of course, that I ever asked such ridiculous questions but sometimes even my own heart turns soft. I actually helped somebody for the first time yesterday and felt good about it. "Where is the pool," a shy young man asked me in a scared voice. I could tell he was truly shook up about being away from home. Feeling fatherly, I gave him the directions he needed for a relaxing swim. "You'll find it at the back of the campus, pal."

"Just head for the horse stables and take a left."

With Bob Haywood
Campus Minister

In this age of continual, increasing specialization of knowledge, it is difficult but essential for our long term personal and global well being that each person seek and develop broader and more unifying philosophical and theological concepts relative to the purpose of their education.

Scott Peck, in his book The Road Less Traveled, begins that with a three word paragraph: "Life is difficult." If you have not discovered this truth already, you will. I do not speak it as a threat, but as a statement of reality which, when accepted, enables us to get on with the business of how we are going to live into the opportunities and possibilities which we discover as we cope with the difficulties of life.

Higher education fits into this process by providing an opportunity to grow and develop in every dimension of our personhood-intellectual, emotional, spiritual, relational, social as well as vocational.

Thomas Merton, one of my spiritual mentors, says: "The first duty of every man is to seek the enlightenment and discipline without which his conscience cannot solve the problems of life. He is correct. And higher education, at its best, can provide that enlightenment and opportunity to develop discipline so that we can develop consciences equipped to cope with problems, possibilities and responsibilities.

Through new experiences and broadened knowledge you can gain not only professional skills but a vision of what life can be like, accompanied by a growing understanding that the true avenue of happiness is not in getting a job that pays big bucks but in finding some means of contributing to the welfare of the human community at its various levels and in its diverse forms.

Do not sell your university career short! The main course of the university "menu" lies in the process of analyzing and thinking, reflecting on and deciding what all the experiences of your university life mean to you and how they are leading you on in your quest for wholeness as well as your quest for the job.

And let me assure you that the faculty and staff at UNCW get most excited when students allow them to break out of the mold of purveyors of information and become engaged in the process of personal transformation however it is taking place in the life of a student.

Open up your horizons. Expand your expectations. Taste all your ideas and experiences as they come your way. It is a grand meal, including the dessert!

Guest Column With Chris Wright

"What is literature?"

That was the question posed to me the other day by a teacher who has spent the major portion of her life reading and studying such nonsense.

My reply, in keeping with my philosophical view towards literature, was not entirely appreciated.

"Literature," I began, "is a collection of all the works that you would not ordinarily read unless someone made you."

She immediately shot back, "then why in the world are you in this class?"

My point. Exactly, precisely, definitely, my point.

The idea of having a select-yet highly neglected-group of prospective professional writers needlessly wasting their time studying ancient scribbles filled with high-calibre, naturalistic overtones, is preposterous.

Why?

Simply because, although these works of art, for lack of a better term-may have a value, they are useless as teaching mechanisms for today's writers. Shakespeare's works are understandable only to those who laboriously take the time to understand them. They are not accessible to the majority of the population.

Ditto Wordsworth. We all have felt emotionally charged by the forces of nature at some point, so what's the big deal? Why write two pages about Tintern Abbey? More to the point, why should I be forced to read it?

Since I have been here, the university catalog has advertised a class in magazine writing, yet the class has never been offered. It seems to me that if you release the writing majors from their literature obligations, as well as the faculty needed to teach those classes, then the combination could easily result in the teaching of more meaningful classes, such as magazine writing.

As professional writing majors, we are treated to an amazingly generous supply of courses to choose from. A quick glimpse of the revised schedule finds a grand total of six.

Literature majors, however, can choose from an ensemble of courses. Moreover, they can avoid the classes they don't wish to take. Writer's do not have that luxury. We are caught in the dilemma of taking every writing course offered or being stuck in another literature class.

I have spent what amounts to be nearly two semesters in literal bondage. Six classes, in addition to other collateral, are required in order for me to acquire my writing degree. Not only does that translate into lost time, but wasted money as well.

Of the six, only one helped my writing. Baseball in Literature, a class since disposed of, I kept a journal which I used to fuel my intense appeal for column writing. Everyday I wrote a baseball column, dealing with current issues and trends, excellent practical training for a writing major.

The syllabus in that class read like a "who's who" of contemporary baseball novelists, a claim very few, if any, other literature classes can make.

The primary problem of course hinges on the "powers-that-be" and their resistance to change. "What an atrocity," they would say, "for an English major at UNCW not to have studied Beowulf."

Beowulf, schmoebeowulf. I say what a pity it is for me not to have read Grizzard, Boswell, Royle, Kornheiser, in addition to other prize winning columns.

But that would make entirely too much sense, something this school has not been too keen on since my arrival.

Oh, and for record, if I really wanted to know just what exactly literature was, don't you think I would have majored in it?

SPIKE BENSONHURST

SPIKE'S HELPFUL HINTS

Well you're back at college or just here for the first time and what's the big question on everybody's mind? What's the cafeteria serving for dinner? Is the line at the bookstore always this long? Is finding a parking spot always this hard? Does God exist? What would professors do for a living if college didn't exist? Would it involve Hardee's? What is a breaded cutlet? Should I actually eat it? Not even close! The only big question you will find yourself wrestling with this year is:

Where's the party tonight?

Well in years past UNCW has had the reputation as a suitcase college. Why I've seen Friday nights when the dorm parking lots have been as bare as a freshmen refrigerator after the food moon and dad bought that first week runs out. However, times are changing.

As the college has grown so has Wilmington and the Seahawk is going to try to provide an up to date calendar with all the events and goings on in Wilmington and the surrounding area. We will tell you where you can shake your thing or bang your head depending on your preference. Reviews of new movies so you can avoid seeing movies like "Dream a Little Dream" by accident, and lists of movies just out on video in case you feel like staying at home.

I did mention parties so let me also give a few helpful hints on those to start the year. If you hear about a party at the beach after 11:15pm save yourself the drive unless you want to get there in time to see the party busted. Also, when you get over the bridge to Wrightsville Beach the speed limit is 35mph, and if you don't believe that ask one of the hundreds of UNCW students who found out the hard way.

When you're at an outdoor party at one of the near by party locals drinking beer under age (hypothetically speaking of course) and the police arrive don't wait till the police ask you to pour out your beer. Sometimes they also ask for an I.D., and I have never seen the police shy about giving out underage drinking tickets.

Whatever you do never present one of Wilmingtons finest with a fake I.D. These people are trained to spot them and receive some kind of strange pleasure when a student hands them over voluntarily. It's sort of like a Christmas thing for them.

Another helpful hint for those of you who want to go to see a band at a local club. Call and find out what type of music they play before you go. There is nothing more hated than paying the cover charge expecting to hear Judas Priest and getting a band that covers Cool and the Gang (or vice versa).

Finally, always ask around about what type of crowd to expect at a club. Showing up at a club full of leather clad bikers listening to Judy Garland records might make you a little uneasy (or right at home, to each his own).

The most important thing to remember whenever or where ever you go is to be careful. Don't drink and drive. You have heard this a million times but this is Spike talking to you. Take a cab, call a friend, but don't drive. College should be just the beginning. Not the end.

Spike's Words of Wisdom for the Week: A Tisket, A Tasket, A Condom, or a Casket. (You think driving drunk is dangerous).

ENTERTAINMENT WRITER
Danish born front man, Mike Tramp, and the rest of the White Lion pride invaded Wilmington's

Trask Coliseum in support of their latest sky-rocketing vinyl, Big Game. While the band was billed as a second act in support of Cinderella, they performed a concert within itself.

Vito Brato was an obvious musical standout live and had no trouble pulling off the bands part and present his with razor sharp accuracy. Tell Me and Dirty Women came through with exceptional clarity while the acoustic track When Children Cry left the sold-out venue lit by cigarette lighters and screams of excitement.

Mike Tramp, more of a front man than a lead vocalist, danced and pranced his way into the hearts of Wilmington (at least the girls who were under 15 yrs. of age.) Tramp did actually put on a great live show, but does personally admit to having been hired by his first band for his looks, not his vocal talent.

Even though Bratto's leads and Tramp's posing and posing would gain much of the night's spot lights, for a live band to really jam they must have a solid rhythm many melodic fillers.

James Lomenzo, bass guitar, and Greg D'Angelo (ex-Anthrax) drums, powered out plenty of thundering rhythms as well as jam they must have a solid rhythm many melodic fillers.

Big Game is White Lion's third vinyl release with Fight to Survive and Pride being the predecessors. It was not until Atlantic records picked up the relative unknowns and financially backed their first major release that the masses began to take notice. With the singles Wait and When the Children Cry, White Lion was able to gain substantial radio and video play. Their new single and video Little Fighter follows much the same strategy used by the Lion's on the last album. The melodic rock combined with a "heart throb" look, White Lion hopes Big Game will be able to match the platinum success of Pride.

While White Lion did pose their way through the set, the band was a pleasant surprise to all who attended. The show was a solid set and ended on their most positive note, an exciting cover of Golden Earring's classic Radar Love.

The Australian Christian rock band the Newsboys will bring their unique brand of Rock-n-Roo Christian music to UNCW on September 13 for a local hunger benefit concert. This four man band from Mooloolaba Queensland, on the Sunshine Coast of Australia will play in Kenan auditorium at 7:30 p.m. with a break in the show for non-Christians to respond to the gospel and receive Christ. The Newsboys who have toured nationally with fellow Christian bands Petra and Whiteheart are supporting their first album "Read All About It". Advance tickets are $2 for students, all others $4. Tickets at the door are $3 for students, and $5 for all others. 50% of all proceeds will go to the Wilmington area food distribution center so come and check out the Newsboys.

TANGIER JAMS

BY JAY FLOWERS
Entertainment Writer

Tangier, a young band from Philly, with only their debut album, Four Winds under their belt, had the difficult task of playing host to the mega-bands White Lion and Cinderella. While the capacity crowd was obviously biased towards the headliners, Tangier's uncompromising rock-style aroused the crowd to one of the most excited responses this veteran concert goer had ever seen. Bill Mattson, the lead screamer, used his strong and powerful vocal techniques to assure even the fans seated in the nose bleed sections a clear and clean sound of no-frills rock-n-roll. The band was able to pound out a solid fifty minute set playing such tracks as "In Time", "South Bound Train", and "On the Line", the latter being a mediocre radio and M.T.V. hit.

The highlight of the show was a catchy song entitled "Sweet Surrender". With its dual harmony leads and a catchy blues rhythm, the song was able to raise the voices of the young crowd to a level very uncommon of that given to the opening act. Even though they are relative newcomers to playing large venues, Tangier's talent as musicians and performers belies their short stint in the world of big metal stars.

...CINDERELLA CONT....

Curry said their only real problem with the tour now is just getting up emotionally to do the show. When asked what it was like to be a heavy metal star, Curry replied that Cinderella did not consider themselves a heavy metal band "Metallica, that's heavy metal. We don't sound like them." He explained that Cinderella considered themselves to be a hard rock band, more along the lines of Led Zeppelin.

When talking about the drug awareness concert in Moscow, Curry expressed how happy he was to have done the concert, and how very happy he was to be back in the U.S. "I don't want to go back to Russia unless it's absolutely necessary," he said.

He also said that Cinderella would be releasing both the Long Cold Winter and Night Songs albums on the Soviet national record label just as Bon Jovi did recently with his New Jersey album, the first U.S. album to be released behind the iron curtain. Curry said this would bring the cost of a rock album in the Soviet Union down to 6 rubles from the nearly 200 rubles Soviet citizens were paying on the black market.

Finally, when asked if he saw Cinderella touring in 25 years like so many older bands this summer he replied, "My eye's aren't that good."

Film

E. Allen Ray

Casualties of War: Starring Michael J. Fox, Sean Penn. Directed by Brian DePalma. Rating: 8 out of a possible 10.

There have been several Vietnam war movies the past few years (Platoon, Hamburger Hill, Good Morning Vietnam), and even a couple of television series (China Beach, Tour of Duty) made about the conflict in Vietnam.

However, "Casualties of War" deals with a side of war and of human nature that none of these other projects addressed. The plot is based on a true story reported by Daniel Lang in the New Yorker magazine in 1969.

The story reported the kidnapping, rape, and eventual murder of a young Vietnamese girl by four U.S. army soldiers. Brian DePalma, the director of Casualties of War first thought of making this movie then, but had to wait until recently to get the picture made.

The preview clips of this movie are deceiving to the viewer in the way that Sean Penn's character Sgt. Meserve is shown. The advance clips show Penn's character as a crazed, bloodthirsty killer that belies the actual depth of the character.

Sgt. Meserve is a highly courageous, skilled soldier that all his men depend on to keep them alive, but with only 30 days left on his tour he has seen all of his friends killed.

He struggles with his responsibility to help the Vietnamese when villages that are supposed to be friendly, shelter Viet Cong that kill his men. Sean Penn is nothing less than brilliant in showing Meserve being pushed over the edge where he views all Vietnamese as the enemy.

Michael J. Fox's character Erickson is the other end of the scenario. Erickson is a cherry, fresh in from the world, and he is not yet been hardened by combat. It is Erickson that reports the crime and must stand up against the system that says these men only made a mistake in judgement.

This film is very unsettling in the way it leads the viewer through all aspects of the crime. The most unsettling thought of the whole film is when Erickson goes to a superior to report the murder and is reminded that Meserve is only 20 years old. He's only a kid, he made a mistake.

Lethal Weapon 2: Mel Gibson, Danny Glover. 8 1/2 out of a possible 10.

Here we go again. "Lethal Weapon 2" opens much the same way the original closed with our two heroes chasing some bad guys. In "Lethal Weapon 2" Det. Martin Riggs (Gibson) and Det. Sergeant Murtaugh (Glover) take on some nasty, gun wielding, drug smuggling diplomats from South Africa who hide behind their diplomatic immunity.

It would seem that South Africans have taken over the role of movie bad guy from the Russians and Nazis. The aspect of South Africans as the movie villains feels the already hot conflict. Not only are these South African selling drugs and killing cops, but their bigots too. If you're trying to decide to see "Lethal Weapon 2" or not let me help you. If you enjoyed the original "Lethal Weapon" with its fast paced action, and it's sense of humor you will enjoy the sequel. It's that simple.

Gibson's portrayal of the semi-suicidal, and always on the edge Det. Riggs is just the same. Danny Glover's Det. Sergeant Murtaugh is still just trying to make it to retirement without getting killed first.

This movie only suffers one major criticism and it is that it is not very original, but with the great actors, good direction, and unstoppable action "Lethal Weapon 2" is very much worth seeing.

The Abyss: Starring Brad Pitt, Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio, and Michael Biehn. Rating: 9 1/2 out of a possible 10.

In this, the latest action/adventure picture by Michael Cameron who brought us The Terminator and Alien, a U.S. nuclear submarine sinks into a 21/2 mile abyss after encountering an unknown force.

Because of a hurricane on the ocean surface the navy is forced to use an underwater oil rig diving team to help with the salvage. The commander of the oil rig (Brad Pitt) and the head engineer who also happens to be his wife (Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio) lead the odd ball group of civilian divers to the salvage.

The leader of the naval seal team Lt. Coffey (Michael Biehn) is the somewhat stereotypical blood and guts military heavy who acts on his own when the hurricane severs communication with the surface.

This 40+ million dollar movie, which was filmed at the never completed Cherokee nuclear station in Gaffney S.C. boasts some of the most incredible special effects ever seen in a motion picture.

The acting is nearly as good as the effects from the stars to the excellent supporting cast. The directing deserves credit also. Michael Cameron displays his unique ability to grab the audience and pull them along with the cast to the furthest depths of the ocean. One warning, it appears that after all the money was spent they forgot to write an ending for this otherwise great film.

Spangler Cracks Down On Athletics

BY KAREN GONDARZI
STAFF WRITER

While N.C. State University wrestles with Jim Valvano in Raleigh, the settling dust will find our own UNCW in a direct firing line of its results.

Following a recent six-month investigation program in the limelight, C.D. Spangler, the University of North Carolina President, has proposed some seven topical recommendations in a report to the N.C. State Board of Trustees.

This report is being dispersed to the 16 schools that make up the N.C. University system. The finger of Spangler will reach UNCW via Athletic Director William J. Brooks late Wednesday afternoon, September 6.

Although exact details of the recommendation will not be known until then, some of the ideas it speaks of have been in the literary and verbal air. Specifically, these ideas include mandatory drug testing of players, the division of Athletic Director and Coach, the exposition of records of funds donated to athletic departments via booster clubs, and better enforcement of academic requirements for entering and present players.

Some schools in the university system do execute voluntary drug testing for athletes. UNC-Chapel Hill is an example, however; UNCW does not test for drugs and never has. The test does involve a potential for controversy and a notable expense of $40-$50 per player.

While Spangler specifically recommended that N.C. State open up its records of funds donated to its athletic department, his 7 point recommendation makes this applicable to all schools.

UNCW's records are and have always been open to the public just for the asking, according to Brooks. Five minutes in the office of R.O. Walton, Jr., Vice-Chancellor for Business here at UNCW, produced a recent figure of $120,000 donated to UNCW athletics in an eight month period, ending in April 1980.

A majority of this money was utilized for athletic scholarships. These funds were donated via the Seahawk Club, which is a collection of different donors, including some alumni. The Seahawk Club is UNCW's equivalent to N.C. State's Wolfpack Club and UNC-Chapel Hill's Ram's Club.

Spangler has also mandated that an Athletic Director of a school cannot simultaneously serve as a coach to that school. While this will require some changes at N.C. State University, there is no "Valvano Factor" at UNCW. Brooks is UNCW's Athletic Director and has been for a number of years, but his actual coaching at UNCW ended in 1984. He is a former UNCW basketball and baseball coach.

Rules governing academic requirements will be given a boost of power in Spangler's recommendations. These are rules concerned with academic achievement for incoming and present players. Bending or strutting of these rules will no longer be tolerated. This is a featured issue in the investigation of the men's basketball program at N.C. State University.

Finally, Spangler has set specific deadlines for the proper adjustments to be made in the universities that require them as a result of this list of recommendations.

Rock And Roll But Not Rap Played In Trask

BY TINA FORD
STAFF WRITER

On September 1, 1980 Trask Coliseum hosted a heavy metal concert consisting of Cinderella, White Lion, and Tangle, to many student's delight. This concert was organized by the Association for Campus Entertainment (ACE). Although this concert was a success, ACE has experienced problems in the past with arranging other performances on campus.

For example, UNCW was faced with a conflict last semester which became upsetting for the administration and students. The problem began when ACE organized a rap music concert which was denied by the Administration.

population on this campus. When other organizations sponsor a concert, predominantly white organizations, there is hardly any controversy on the matter whatsoever.

Junior Lee Foy said, "The class in the contract for a metal detector was just standard procedure, it did not necessarily mean violent action would be present. It really only applied to large cities with a probable chance for a bad situation to emerge. I think the cancellation of Kid-n-Play was too quick a decision."

Many students kept asking, "Why was the concert cancelled?" While the administration continuously stated their explanation for their disapproval, they felt the concert was not worth the effort since the rap groups

I feel that the rap concert that was cancelled last year was very unfair to black students...Tyrone Robinson

Francis Castillo, President of ACE, said, "In my opinion, the concert was a success. It seemed that the people there enjoyed themselves. And there weren't any problems at all. Hopefully, in the future we'll be able to have other concerts on campus."

Some students felt they were arbitrarily being denied a right often freely enjoyed, that is the right to enjoy the performance of a particular music group. The denial was perceived as a slap in the face of rap lovers, especially when an announcement was subsequently made that UNCW would instead be the host to three heavy metal groups.

Tyrone Robinson, a senior, said, "I feel that the rap concert that was cancelled last year was very unfair to the black student required metal detectors. Administration felt its presence would be a hedge against unruly behavior."

The end result was dissatisfaction on both sides. The students were dissatisfied at the loss of a rap concert, and the administration was dissatisfied with the accusation of being perceived as a relic of the Dark Ages.

There is, however, a shred of hope for those who want another rap concert. John Freer, the Chairman of the Concert Committee, comments, "there is a possibility that another rap concert may be arranged, but we need to come to an agreement before the contract is signed."

How High Will Tuition and Fees Rise?

(CPS) - For the ninth year in a row, the price students pay to attend college has risen faster than the inflation rate, the College Board says.

Educators and other adult observers bemoaned the increases, yet generally thought the price of college remained affordable. Students, on the other hand, seemed to greet the news with more alarm.

"I keep seeing it increase, but there's no (financial aid) help and not a lot of improvements," said Southwestern Oklahoma State University junior Ronda Mills. "Several of my friends are unable to be here because of it."

Mills and her classmates registered at Southwestern Oklahoma August 22 to find their tuition had risen 17 percent, to $1160.

"If they hike tuition again next year I'm not coming back," declared Melissa Lopez, a University of New Mexico junior. Despite an eight-day student occupation of President Gerald May's office last spring, UNM officials raised the annual in-state tuition $100 to $1372.

Nationwide, colleges will pay an average of 3 to 9 percent more for tuition and fees this academic year, the College Board reported in its just-released annual tuition survey. The general inflation rate for the 12 months ending in June was 5.2 percent.

At public four-year schools, average tuition and fees is up 7 percent, to $1694. Students at private schools will pay an average of $8737, 9 percent more than in 1988-89.

Two-year public schools raised their tuition 5 percent to $842. Two-year private schools hiked their prices an average of 7 percent, to $4713.

In addition to higher tuition, the College Board said students can expect to pay 6 to 7 percent more for on-campus room and board.

About the only official who expressed much worry about the jumps was U.S. Dept. of Education Sec. Lauro Cavazos.

"I am increasingly concerned about the growing gap between the price of higher education and what students can afford," Cavazos said. "Every leader in higher education must make holding costs down a priority."

In fact, colleges are doing an "extraordinary" job of holding down their costs, maintained Richard Rosser of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, based in Washington, DC.

"They're doing it, too, at a time when they're scratching for funds to keep faculty members from leaving for more lucrative jobs in private industry, to repair campus facilities left unmaintained for years, and to retrofit campuses for the computer age."

As a result, higher education remains "within the reach of virtually every qualified student," asserted College Board President Donald Stewart in releasing the report.

He said students who don't have the money themselves can get it from some $26 billion worth of financial aid available to college students this year.

"There's no reason for qualified students not to be enrolled in higher education," agreed David Merkwitz of the American Council on Education (ACE), a campus presidents' trade group based in Washington, DC.

Kent Halstead of Research Associates of Washington, DC said that his 1988 study of college prices concluded tuition rates remain about the same percentage of average American incomes as they were two decades ago.

Consequently Halstead believed college is still "a good buy."

"It's hard to make the case that most mid to lower class students can't afford (college)," said Halstead. "Most increases are only about $100 a year. People can buy a portable radio for that price."

College will continue to be bargain until "people say they can't afford as much education as they want," he said. "If a student says he can't go because of financial problems, then it's too high."

Some students argue tuition already has reached that point.

"If it were any higher, I'd have to drop out," said UNM student Lisa Rivas, who supports herself through federal loans and an on-work-study job at the school's financial aid office. "I see a lot of students in here who are breaking down over the increase."

Not all schools raised tuition, though. Southern Arkansas University cut money from equipment, travel and other budgets to avoid raising its rates.

"This is a trade-off between getting as much quality as we can afford and keeping students here who might drop out," said President Harold Brinson in announcing the decision.

Some schools are opting to charge new students more than current ones.

The University of Chicago and Duke, Johns Hopkins, Seton Hall and George Washington universities all have announced two-tiered plans in which new students will be hit with bigger increases than those imposed on upperclass students.

At Duke, new Arts and Sciences students will pay $12,800 per year, $1450 more than returning students.

Students might as well get used to annual tuition increases of about 6 to 7 percent into the foreseeable future, the ACE's Merkwitz predicted.

For all the complaining, students do seem willing to pay. "It's incredibly high," senior Delia Reid said of her tuition at Bennington College in Vermont, which at $16,495 is the highest in the country. "But it's worth it. If you don't have a penny and they want you to come here, they'll make sure you can."

Carelessness Leads To Death

(CPS) - A man accused of murdering his ex-girlfriend and her companion on the University of Washington campus July 25 may have used an illegally obtained class schedule to track the victim down.

The case has raised serious questions about how well campuses protect "private" student records.

At UW, suspect Azizollah Mazoni allegedly obtained a copy of victim Marjan Mohseninia's schedule despite her request that the records remain confidential.

Mazoni found Mohseninia, an 18-year-old UW student, and a friend, 27-year-old Abraham Sharif-Kashani, as she was leaving class. Both were shot moments later.

Campus Police think Mazoni, the victim's former boyfriend, tracked Mohseninia to UW, where he fooled clerks into giving him Mohseninia's schedule by giving them her Social Security number and birth date. The clerks, unsure whether "Marjan Mohseninia" was a male or female name, complied.

"It's impossible to walk in and ask for someone's schedule without having very specific information," said Melanie Bell, associate director of admissions and records. "We have no idea how it happened."

Keeping student records private has proven difficult at other schools, too.

Last September, someone stole a list of all the foreign students at Arizona State University from the Student Life Office. Last summer, a thief snatched a printout of ASU students' names and used it to try to sell furniture to those listed.

And at the universities of Nebraska and Houston, concerns arose last year about posting grades outside offices or classrooms with students' Social Security numbers as identifiers.

The 1974 Buckley Amendment restricts the release of "personally identifiable records or files" to anyone other than appropriate school officials without student consent.

Banks Will Limit Loans In The Future

(CPS) - Even though fewer students are defaulting on their loans, many banks are reducing or eliminating loans to students who go to certain schools, the Consumer Bankers Association (CBA) claims.

"Students who are most at risk (of not getting loans) are the ones who attend a one-year trade school, particularly the poor quality schools," said Fritz Elmendorf of the CBA, a banking lobbying group in Washington, DC.

Banks in general are limiting loans to students at schools with default rates higher than 25 percent. Two-year community colleges and trade schools tend to have the highest default rates, the U.S. Dept. of Education said.

Most students at four-year campuses won't have problems getting their loans," Elmendorf predicted.

"In light of increased efforts by the Department of Education to crack down on schools with high default rates, it is not surprising to see many more lenders cutting off loans to those schools," said Joe Belov, CBA president.

Separately, the Education Dept. reported that 17 percent of the loans out to students nationwide are in default, a 4-point drop from the rate in August, 1988.

Elmendorf called the drop proof that more aggressive efforts to get students to repay their loans are working, though he added that some of the efforts, by placing the burden on lenders and colleges to collect payments, are provoking banks to stop making Stafford loans.

"Default is a problem, but even more so is the federal response to default," Elmendorf said.

A CBA survey of 89 lenders indicates that 66.3 percent would eliminate Stafford Loans (formerly GSE) if Congress adopts a new "risk sharing" anti-default program.

Way Out In (W)right Field

Chris Wright
Sports Editor

Receiving less than a cheerful response

I trust everyone had an enjoyable summer. I know I did, or was attempting to anyway when the strangest thing happened at a night club I frequented often.

I was there with a couple of female friends doing what people do at these clubs when suddenly I was jolted back into last year.

I landed with a thud. "Are you Chris Wright?" screamed this pretty little blonde, obviously not aware that the song I was jamming to had not yet ended.

"Depends," I said. "Who wants to know?" "I do," she said, even more hastily than before. Call me prophetic, but I sensed a slight degree of unbridled animosity in her voice.

It was only after she started asking others who I was that I came clean and revealed my identity. A big mistake.

"So," she began, "you're the one who put down the cheerleaders last year." Her jaws were quivering; her fists clenching.

I tried to run, but there was no use. The verbal assault was on.

"Do you not know how difficult it is to be a cheerleader?"

I confessed I did not. Another mistake. She took the better part of the next hour explaining the demands of her endeavor.

I finally asked her what exactly in my column of a year ago, whereby I denounced cheerleading as a sport, elicited such utter rage. My reasons for the column were plentiful. Cheerleaders do not cheat, I reminded her. They are not given expensive cars, nor are they allowed to spend weekends up at the alumni's condo.

I was merely implying that because cheerleaders actually have to qualify for school, attend regularly, and maintain a lofty grade-point-average, then there is no way they could be considered a sport. Real sports thrive on the corruptive propensities of its participants, and cheerleaders are simply too honest to be caught up in such nonsense.

Somewhere, I must have missed the boat. After nearly a year, she quoted verbatim a passage where I had unintentionally given the notion that cheerleaders are lazy.

I might be wrong, but if someone goes to the trouble of tracking you down in a dark club, dragging you off the dance floor, and then quoting something that the rest of the world has long since forgotten, then it seems to me that that someone was highly offended.

I wrote, "cheerleaders are thrown effortlessly through the air." I meant that as a compliment. UNCW's cheerleaders were among the nations upper echelon last year, and the ease with which they reached that point was misleading.

The made it look easy to us, the novice's, because of the hard work and relentless efforts that went on behind the closed doors of Hanover Hall.

I had little idea of the long hours, but she kindly took the time to inform me.

"We work harder than any other group," she said. "We have to maintain a certain GPA, make speaking engagements. We can't drink."

"Then what's that in..."

"We also practice four hours every day and we are not thrown effortlessly through the air."

I'm not quite sure how to end this, but I think a relatively strong moral can be reached nonetheless.

Remember, the next time you go to Trask and the game is boring and you just happen to gaze at these beauties on the sidelines, please take a moment to recall the hard work and dedication it took to swing those hips and pout those lips.

I know I will.

Wild, wet weather nets nothing for Hawks

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

The old saying "when it rains, it pours," aptly described the season debut of UNCW men's soccer team. Playing under adverse conditions of freezing rain and blowing winds the Seahawks dropped their first game of the season to the Charleston Cougars, 2-0.

"We didn't play aggressive or finish our shots when we had the opportunity," said head coach Jackie Blackmore.

The Hawks often looked confused and disorganized in how they should handle the ball. There were long stretches where the players seemed to forget some of the basic fundamentals of soccer. Mental lapses and lack of communication on the field gave way to errant passes and people out of position. The Hawks, who lost standout midfielder David Creswell and John Hollenbach to graduation, appeared many times lost without a leader to guide them.

"Anytime you lose an experienced senior like David or John it hurts," said Blackmore.

This lack of experience on the relatively young Hawk team led to the Cougars' first goal at the 27:15 mark of the first half.

A Seahawk defensive fullback boot was blocked by the Cougars Alvin Dark who then tapped a leading pass to forward Colin Osborne. As Osborne was being run down by a Hawk defensive back, goalie John Pinter shouted instructions to his teammate on how to cut the scorer off to the goal.

A miscommunication was the result as Osborne slipped around the defender and slid the ball between Pinter's legs. This confusion resulted in a shouting match between the two teammates on who's fault was the goal. Tempers on both sides of the ball would flare as the rains came down even harder.

In the opening ten minutes of the second half the Hawks started playing like the well-oiled machine of old. Crisp sideline passes and give 'n' go runs were beginning to click for the Green Machine.

This led to several opportunities to score, but a strong Charleston goalie (Jeff Taraboulas) and a gritty Cougars defense stymied the Hawks.

After this initial success in the early going the rest of the Seahawk's seemed a mirror replay of the first half mess. Missed assignments and lack of confidence in themselves let their play down.

The second goal was scored at the 76:36 mark on a long clearing pass that caught the Seahawk defense playing too far up field. The streaking Cougar, Luis Viera, ran down the ball just in front of the goal mouth and blasted a high arching shot that buried itself in the left side of the net.

"We were pushing people up in order to apply pressure to their side," Blackmore said. "Unfortunately, when that happens you sometimes get caught short when the ball changes direction suddenly."

Pinter, who last year recorded two shutouts, was credited with a pair of saves as only five Charleston shots were taken.

The defense wasn't the only thing cut short. Tempers flared on both side of the ball as the Hawks were frustrated by their adversary aggressive, and sometimes downright mugging, tactics and skirmishes happened periodically during the game. Three Hawks and one Cougar received yellow cards during the contest.

The weather didn't help matters any as a total of 9 shots were taken by both squads during the contest.

"The wet grass made the ball move really fast and sometimes it was difficult to control," said freshman Scott Lefteris. He and Junior Ronald Smith were two of the bright spots to a dismal afternoon.

Lefteris, who at 5'5" is one of the smallest players in the Colonial Athletic Association, gives great meaning to the claim that soccer can be played by anyone.

Usually a small man is destined to ride the pines but Lefteris defies this stigma by playing with such tenacity and intensity that opponents often forget the size differential. "Sooty is doing very well but he still needs to gain experience to be even better," Blackmore said.

Junior Ronald Smith missed last season due to academic reasons, but has come back with a vengeance in '89.

The sleek forward from Gaithersburg, Maryland, covers the field well and is constantly attacking the ball on the field. "Ron really hungry for this season since he had to sit last year," said Blackmore.

The Seahawks are still trying to find a new leader in the array of new and old faces.

Their next chance to do so will occur when they take the field next against the Dukes of Jame Madison at Brooks Field on Sept. 8 at 4 p.m.

Lady Spiker's try to regain form

From staff reports

Graduation has taken its toll on the UNCW girl's volleyball team, leaving head coach Kathy McDaniel agast as to how they will duplicate last season's 30-3 record.

The most notable void is hitter Dede Devoley, last year named first-team All-Colonial Athletic Association. Also missing from last year's team are four-year starter Lisa Mills, and Mary Lou Ryan.

Last year's team set school records for most victories, fewest losses, best winning percentage, and most consecutive wins during the season.

This season, with only two starters returning from last year's squad that reeled off a 15-game winning streak, the degree of success this year will fall heavily on the performance of two-time All-CAA hitter Yvonne Holan.

Overall, the team is very young. Holan is the lone senior, but she should receive quality help from juniors Hannah Helton and Heather Kimble. All three started last season and Kimble played in a team-high 111 games.

The Seahawks have added three freshmen, including setter Sheldon Plentovich, formerly of Hoggard, to help offset the losses due to graduation.

McDaniel also added another in-state product, Shelley Muscat a 5'10" hitter from Western Guilford H.S. in Greensboro. The Seahawks final recruit is Jeannie Daab a 5'10" hitter from Smithtown H.S. in Kings Point, NY.

UNCW opens play Friday in the UNC Invitational at Chapel Hill before returning to Hanover Gym for their 7 p.m. home opener against Charleston.

The Seahawk Volleyball team practices for the upcoming season. This year is a rebuilding year for the Hawks, who try to improve on last year's incredible mark of 30-3. This year's schedule will test a young team that lost many of its top players to graduation. The team will depend on the talents of All-CAA Yvonne Holan and juniors Heather Kimble and Hannah Helton to lead an inexperienced Hawk squad against one of the toughest schedules in their history. Last year the team missed going to a post-game tournament by one ranking position. They're first game is at the Chapel Hill Invitational on Friday. An undefeated home record will be on the line on Sept. 12th when the Seahawks face Charleston.

Ultimate team clinches tournament

BY SUZI SHERFIELD
SPORTSWRITER

Congratulations to the UNCW Ultimate team for an overwhelming victory at the Labor Day club tournament at Charlotta.

Out of six games played at the tournament, UNCW won them all with a final score of 13-12 against Columbia, SC, in the final match. "We're using a new offense where the game is spread out to enhance the potential of flow. Flow is the movement of the disc on the field," says Michael McDonald, who played in Sunday's tournament.

This and "team work" were the winning combination according to the teams founder and captain Toad Ledger. Another important factor in the Ultimate's first place ranking was their amazing defense as player Danny Wrenn explains, "Everyone was laying out for the D."

McDonald feels that their victory this past weekend only foreshadows the performance of the team during its regular season in the spring.

Come see the UNCW Ultimate team play! Howie Molloy says, "Ultimate has become a true sport."

UNCW to name assistant

From staff reports

At 3:30 p.m. today the Athletics Department will hold a press conference in Trask Coliseum to announce a new Assistant Athletic Director to head AD, Bill Brooks. Horvath tickets are on sale for the return of alumni Brian Rowsom to the hardcourts of UNCW. Ticket prices are $15 and $20 and are available at the University Union and other ticket outlets. The CAA conference has expanded to six fouls allowed in the upcoming '89-90 basketball season. They are the fifth conference to adopt this new rule (See story on rule change in next week's Seahawk). The drug testing issue regarding UNCW's athletic program will come to a head at the end of the week (Also see Seahawk for coverage). If you feel that Rowsom's number should be retired prior to the exhibition game against the Nets, write us. It is past time that our school's most prolific player is honored in such a way.

Rowsom's coming home

CHRIS WRIGHT
SPORTS EDITOR

Brian Rowsom is coming home. Rowsom, the all-time leading scorer and rebounder in Seahawk history, will mark his return to Trask Coliseum during an NBA exhibition game between the Charlotte Hornets and the New Jersey Nets on Oct. 20 at 8 p.m.

The game is part of an eight game preseason schedule including four games in the Carolinas. These four games are being sponsored by Neil McGeachy, the same promoter who brought the ACC-All Stars to Trask last season.

For Rowsom, it will be a homecoming of sorts, and although he wasn't on hand during last Thursday's press conference teammate Dave Hoppin said the message was clear. Rowsom is looking forward to his return to Wilmington.

"One guy, Brian Rowsom, in particular is excited about coming back here and putting on a good show," Hoppin said. "He's all the time trying to get me and my wife to come to the coast. He just loves this area and the people."

Rowsom, who is the only Seahawk in history to record over 1900 points and 1,000 rebounds, recently signed a multi-year contract with the Hornets, a good indication that his status as an NBA player is now solidified.

"I've always thought that if I worked hard, I could play in the NBA," said Rowsom. "I'm excited that the coaches and organization see my potential and I am working very hard to improve so I can make my best contribution to the team next year."

Last season, Rowsom, 23, suffered a broken fifth metatarsal on his left foot and sat out 45 games. At the time of the injury Rowsom was averaging nearly 10 points and six rebounds per contest, statistics that opened the eyes of several Hornets scouts, including General Manager Carl Scheer.

"Brian was starting to show the promise that we had anticipated before going down with the injury," Scheer said. "He's a strong rebounder and a good inside scorer with young, fresh legs."

Tickets for the Friday night game are on sale now and available at the University Union.

"Humans and the Marine Environment"

UNCW--Dr. Lawrence B. Cahoon, associate professor of biological sciences, will discuss how humans use as well as abuse marine and coastal resources in a special course, "Humans and the Marine Environment" offered by UNC Wilmington's Office of Special Programs. Topics include global climate changes, agriculture, red tides and marine pollution. The class meets Wednesdays, October 18-November 15, from 7:30-8:30 pm on the UNCW campus. The $35 regular fee will be discounted to $30 for enrollment by October 4. Registration deadline is October 11.

For more information or to register by credit card, contact the Office of Special Programs, 395-3578.

Onley Teaches Better Study Habits

UNCW--Professor Claude Onley's course, "Where There's A Will, There's An A," a training program to help students achieve higher grades, will be offered this fall through UNC Wilmington's Office of Special Programs. The class teaches students, through videotapes and discussion, how to learn more in less time--with higher retention. It will be moderated by OSP coordinator Jan Johnson. The class is scheduled for Monday and Wednesday, October 2 and 4 from 7:00-8:30 pm. The regular fee of $15 will be discounted to $10 for registration before September 18. Registration deadline is September 25.

For more information, contact the Office of Special Programs, 395-3578.

UNCW Players Present "The Moose"

THE MOOSE!, a comedy in two acts by Wilmington author James Burke will be presented at 8 p.m. September 26 at Sarah Graham Kenan Memorial Auditorium on the campus of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. Tickets are $4 for general admission and $1 for UNC-W students with ID. For information call 791-9695 or 395-3218.

Note: The content of this play might offend some people. It is NOT RECOMMENDED for children.

Deputies at the New Hanover County Court House patted down observers before allowing them into the trial of Roderick Stallings, the Wilmington teen-ager accused of shooting UNCW student Kurt Lindstrom at a party last spring.

Roderick Stallings testified Wednesday regarding the charge of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, causing a serious injury. Stallings is accused of coercing Greg Sidbury into firing a pistol at a crowd of party goers in the Twinwood apartment complex. He claimed the statement "Shoot down there and scare them" was only a joke. The shot resulted in the permanent paralysis of UNCW student Kurt Lindstrom.

Greg Sidbury, the witness who quoted Stallings, has already pleaded guilty to an assault charge and admitted firing into the Twinwood party. His testimony Tuesday revealed that he was encouraged to shoot by the occupants of the car. Stallings and three young girls. His testimony was not part of a plea bargain.

After being pelted with beer cans and bottles on Varsity Drive, Sidbury fired a warning shot into the air through the sunroof of the car. The crowd disbursed and the car proceeded to Wilshire Boulevard. After driving to Pinewood Apartments to look for friends, they returned to the Twinwood area. Encouraged by the occupants of the car, Sidbury took a handgun from under the seat, aimed it out towards the party and fired a single shot that was aimed over the heads of the people, according to Sidbury's testimony.

According to Billy Mason, attorney for the defense, a guilty verdict can only be found if Stallings is proven to have aided and abetted; shared criminal intent, or encouraged; or acted in concert; pursuing a common plan or purpose. Stallings denied these actions, claiming he did not request that anyone be injured. He was only agreeing with the girls in the back seat of the car, "I thought everybody was joking, so I went along with the joke...As we approached, we said 'go ahead'". The defense motioned that the charges against Stallings be dropped.

Both Sidbury and Stallings denied any conversations in the car; both after the beer bottles were thrown at the car, and on the way back to Twinwood, a total of 6-10 minutes. Stallings said he was not angry at the crowd because he didn't know who threw the bottles at the car and made the racial remarks.

After the shooting, the two men and three girls went to Valentino's in Brunswick county. On the way, they stopped at a gas station in Leland, cleaned up the car of the beer and cans and inspected the car for damages. None were found. According to the defendant, no discussion of the night's events took place.

Stallings did not realize that the incident April 14, 1989 was related to the news reports of a student shot until almost a week later. Family and friends of the defendant characterized him as peaceful, honest, and not temperamental.

Break In Suspects Flee

BY MAI NGUYEN NEWS EDITOR

At approximately 11:50 P.M. on Thursday, September 7, the UNCW police department received a telephone call concerning the sound of breaking glass near the Student Union.

Officer Sheila Wuske, first to respond to call, checked around and inside the building until she arrived to the hall door of the game room. It was through the glass wall that Officer Wuske witnessed a young man attempting to burglarize a game machine.

In an effort to be discreet and call for assistance immediately, Wuske's presence was discovered and the man escaped through the emergency exit door on the north side of the building. Wuske then pursued the suspect as far as Randall Drive near Hardee's but was unable to apprehend him.

Meanwhile, Officer Wright responding to the back up call, spotted a second male suspect fleeing towards King Hall. The young man was seen retrieving a bicycle from some nearby bushes and escaped to the front of the campus. Detective Sgt. Willis, the officer in charge of the case, believes the suspect originally tried to breach the game room by breaking a glass window. Since efforts to enter through the window were unsuccessful, the culprit removed the hinges from the emergency exit door as an alternative means to get inside.

Fortunately, no money was taken from either of the machines that were damaged.

Sgt. Willis believes this particular attempt "fits in the same general pattern of several crimes committed earlier this year."

The first individual, spotted by Liske, was described as a black male between 25-30 years old and weighing about 180-190 pounds. The 5'9"-6'1" suspect had black, curly, shoulder length hair and he wore a blue-gray sweatshirt.

The second suspect was also a black male weighing about 175-180 pounds and was wearing a dark blue shirt and gray pants. This individual was 19 or 20 years old and had a slim built figure.

Sgt. Willis encourages anyone who has information regarding this incident as well as any other crime to call the "Seahawk Crime Line," an innovation established by the department earlier in the year. Callers identities will remain anonymous and a reward may be given for any information the UNCW police department finds useful.

Thief Seized

BY MAI NGUYEN NEWS EDITOR

On Tuesday, September 12, twenty-two year old Michael Gore was arrested by Chief Billy Dawson, head of the university police. Gore was charged by the UNCW police department on two counts of breaking and entering and larceny.

The previous day, two residents of Hewlett Hall reported a 19" color television and a bicycle missing from their suite. A student had witnessed the 5'8"-5'9" slender black male leaving Hewlett in an automobile with a bicycle in the trunk. While on duty, an officer saw the suspicious looking man and followed him until the suspect's car was lost in traffic.

The following morning all officers were ordered to be on surveillance for a 1984 Chevrolet. Officers recognized the vehicle later that morning parked in the O lot. When the driver returned to the car, he was confronted and questioned.

Although the man gave false and misleading information about his identity, the police were able to accurately identify him. The Wilmington Police Department has charged Gore with auto larceny (for the stolen Chevrolet he was driving) and other outstanding warrants for his arrest.

Although the bicycle has not been recovered, the television was found in the back seat of the stolen car Gore was driving. Apparently, Gore had entered the suite through an unlocked door and stole the television. He then crossed to the adjoining bedrooms, through the bathroom and took the bicycle.

Sergeant Willis encourages students to make sure all valuables are secured. "Everyone should take responsibility in recognizing strangers in the building and look out for each other," he commented.

Minorities Sought

BY TASHA ROONE MANAGING EDITOR

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington is the youngest school within the UNC school system and it is growing fast. According to Bob Fry, director of Institutional Research, statistics indicated that this year UNCW has the largest number of students ever, totaling over seven thousand.

However, of these numbers only 448 are black: a 6.4 percentage. This percentage does not meet the states minority code of 7%. UNCW has not met the requirement in recent years, but came close in 1988 with a 6.7% enrollment. That fall semester, a total of 6,553 students were enrolled, 441 of which were black.

Director of Admissions Diane Zeeman says the University is doing everything possible to recruit minority students. The UNC school system has been under a constant decree, which set guidelines for recruiting minorities until it expired two years ago explained Zeeman. "However, some schools have elected to continue their efforts in recruiting minorities including UNCW," she said.

Each year, the Admissions office sets aside a separate day set as Minority Visitation Day. This year, however, they sent out a minority pamphlet as well, to minority students who have taken the PSAT and the SAT. Zeeman explains that minority students here are used as tour guides and serve on a panel so visitors can ask questions about campus life. "Basically what we are trying to do is get them on campus," says Zeeman.

The admissions office has set up a minority achievement award for academically inclined highschool seniors. This is the fifth year of the award. "The award pays for twenty-five minority students tuition and fees for four years," says Zeeman. "Karla Alston, last years' (first black woman) Student Government President, was our first in the class of academic achievement award recipients."

Children Sought For Tutoring and Evaluation

UNCW is seeking 60 students K-12th grades to enroll in tutoring sponsored by the UNCW School of Education.

Tutoring is conducted by graduate and undergraduate education students under supervision of professional staff on an individual basis.

Students attend two one-hour sessions per week. The education lab in King Hall 210 is open for tutoring between 3 and 6 p.m. Sessions begin the week of Sept. 18, and the fee is $3 per hour.

To enroll your child, call the education lab at 395-3633 between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

UNCW Football Club vs. Chapel Hill Saturday

The UNC-W Football Club would like to invite all UNCW students, faculty and staff to our first home game against UNC-Chapel Hill. Admission is free. There will be free food and drinks so come support your team. Saturday, Sept. 16 at Brooks Field, at 2:00 p.m.

Medical Technology Career Day Open House

The Medical Technology Career Day Open House will be held Tuesday, September 26, from 12:00 noon to 1:30 p.m. in Friday Hall 116 & 119. Students will have the opportunity to learn about the many positions available and starting salaries from representatives of N.C. Hospitals.

Steering Committee Announces First Speaker

The Steering Committee for Science and Society in the Curriculum announces the first speaker in its fall lecture series on "Futurescapes." Dr. Robert Kargon, history of science professor at Johns Hopkins University, will speak on "The Natural and Artificial" Monday, September 18, at 8 p.m. in King Hall Auditorium. On September 19, at 3 p.m. in Randall Library Auditorium Dr. Kargon will speak on "Science Cities."

Freshmen Find A New Life

BY HOLLY PRICE

STAFF WRITER

With maps in their pockets and schedules in hand, UNCW's freshman class of 1993 started off their first two weeks of school with a bang.

Most freshmen said that finding their way around campus wasn't a problem. "I still keep my map handy though," Nikki English says with a sly grin.

Bicyclists seem to be a primary complaint from students maneuvering across campus. Unfortunately, there have been a few accidents. One freshman who was struck with a bicycle suffered a sprained ankle and a bicycle collision.

Apparently students who haven't ridden in years have suddenly found bikes to be their main mode of transportation. With a sad look, Linda Hair says, "I miss my car so much. I can't go anywhere."

Most freshmen have found that their classes aren't as hard as they expected. They like their professors' laid-back attitudes compared to the opposite dispositions of many high school teachers. Due to the variety of high schools they come from, some of the freshmen think the classes are small while others find them huge. "There is a lot, and I do mean a lot more reading involved," Will Mitchell said with dismay.

College brought a new living experience to most freshmen. Some knew their roommates from previous acquaintance. Although this may seem a blessing, many found that living with a person that seemed nice before can be a bit trying. Little habits that went unnoticed during a friendship can be disconcerting in the confines of a dorm room. For most new roommates though, there is the opportunity to make new and often-lasting friendships.

Along with this new environment comes the sadness of leaving home. Everyone interviewed had mixed feelings about this new experience. Most were happy to finally be on their own, but some spent the first two weeks on the phone long distance. A recurring theme seems to be missing a boyfriend or girlfriend. "My phone bill is going to be so high," Robin Jenkins said.

In some cases, three students were forced to share a single dorm room, but last week this practice was disposed of. "At times it did seem a little crowded," Bridget Stephens said. "But everyone took it in stride." Rooms in other dorms gradually became available and most students are now settled in.

Resident Director of Belk Hall Karen Robinson says they haven't had many problems with the freshman girls. "The guys wanting to be here after hours has been the only problem I've run into," she said.

Karen loves being a RD because she wants to go into counseling and she sees it as a good experience. "I've had a lot of girls come to me with roommate problems or other things, but we can usually work them out, and of course that's what I'm here for," she said.

The third floor RA of Graham Hall, Michael Ingram, only had one complaint. "The first few nights after their parents left they went crazy. Since then it's been pretty quiet." He's helped out with a lot of common questions about professors, classes, and of course that all time favorite "Where is the Math Lab?" He says, "so far it's been a great experience."

Questions about organizations and on-campus functions seem to have been asked a million times. Many students are going through Rush and are scared to death. It's like starting all over again, meeting so many new faces. Freshman who have gotten involved in clubs and organizations are really enjoying themselves.

The only two major complaints about the way things run on campus were the cafeteria food, which freshmen have learned to accept, and the combination mailboxes that nobody can get open.

Beyond campus, many have ventured to the beach at least once. The beach is a great place to relax after classes and a lot of freshmen reluctantly said that's one of the main reasons they came to school here. Shawn Booth says, "going to UNCW makes surfing a lot easier."

Some students haven't been anywhere else in Wilmington but on campus or nearby for those midnight snacks (the "run for the border"). Students said they felt a little isolated at times, especially those with no car.

New dorms ("the suites") has added a great amount of housing space for freshmen as well as for upperclassmen. Students approve of the spacious new rooms. "I love moving into a room that no one has ever lived in before," says Hair. "The only problem seems to be the distance from central campus."

Most students have adjusted really well and love UNCW. It's become their second home already. Freshman Rick Argo summed up entering college by saying, "[It's] had a big impact on my free life. UNCW provides great intellectual aspects, not to mention numerous extracurricular activities."

Greeks Celebrate

TINA FORD

STAFF WRITER

This year, Wilmington celebrated its third annual Port City Classic weekend on September 9 and 10. This gave the black Greeks an opportunity to demolish the stereotype that they received at Virginia Beach.

The weekend was filled with exciting events to attract visitors to the city. To kick off the festivities, Delta Sigma Theta Sorority held a dance in the University Union, while Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity held a party at Andre's.

Wanda Credle, a member of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, said, "the purpose of presenting a dance during Port City Classic weekend was to provide entertainment for the community and incoming visitors."

"We wanted to unite three universities and show that minorities can come together for a common cause, have fun, and not be stereotyped as rowdy, ruthless, and militant," added Martin Green, a member of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity.

On Saturday morning at 10 a.m. there was a parade filled with marching bands and floats, including a float from Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity. Later that afternoon, at 2 p.m., there was a game between Fayetteville State and Elizabeth City State University.

Following the game, Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity held a dance and a stepshow competition which was a success. "The main reason was to provide the visiting students of ECSU and FSU and our fellow students with some unique, enjoyable entertainment."

"We didn't experience any problems," said Ron Hamm, a member of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity.

The weekend turned out to be pleasant for everyone attending. However, the festivities at Virginia Beach last Labor Day weekend were not as peaceful.

During the Labor Day weekend, many black Greeks travelled from various campuses to Virginia Beach to celebrate the annual Greekfest. However, this year their celebration was interrupted by an outbreak of violence.

Soon after, the blame for the rioting was laid with black sororities and fraternities. Stephanie Canty, a member of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority who was at the Greekfest also commented, "there's no way of actually proving that it was the Greeks. I think it was provoked by the police officers. Also, I feel the Greekfest should be moved to another location."

"I don't feel the Greeks should be responsible for what happened because it was a social function that was open to the public. Although it may have been sponsored by the Greeks, we cannot assume total responsibility," said Joyce White, a member of Zeta Phi Beta Sorority.

When asked if he felt the incident would affect the Greeks of UNCW, Kenny Mickens, a member of Kappa Alpha Psi stated, "no, I don't think it will because the environment here is different. Also, it shouldn't be called a Greekfest because a majority of the people are not Greeks."

Looking Into Media

BY SANDY PORTER

STAFF WRITER

During the past summer, SGA members worked to appoint a Media Task Force Committee to study possibilities of improving the operations of student media. Student Body President Jim Humphries headed the committee and earlier this month constructed the Task Force along with Chancellor William H. Wagoner.

The Media Task Force will study the governments of each media branch at UNCW. A study will also be made into the Media Publications Board which elects the editor and director of the individual media associations.

Mimi Cunningham, director of University Relations, was asked to be the chair person and administration representative for the group which is composed of students, faculty members and administrators. They hope their evaluation of the four media on campus will bring forth constructive suggestions to aid in their improvement. The four media consist of The Seahawk, The Flying Yearbook, The Atlantic, and the radio station WLOZ.

Cunningham commented,

"basically the Task Force is here to see if we need to offer any recommendations to improve the quality of student media. We are seeking to enrich UNCW's media so as to have better publications and better campus radio."

The Committee is also looking to increase student involvement by perhaps providing salaries, scholarships or credit hours to future students.

Task Force Member Ann Devaney, associate director of the University Union, feels "the Task Force is a good representative group in terms of where we can go, and the options we can choose from to form a quality of media sources at UNCW."

Right now the Task Force is in the preliminary information gathering stage. Each sect of UNCW's media and faculty representatives from different schools have been asked to speak before the Task Force individually.

After all the reports are made to the committees, the group will divide into sub-committees and assess the information. Cunningham hopes to have the report done by the end of the semester.

Moving Fast in ROTC

BY SUSAN JARVIS

Most UNCW students probably had a very interesting and fun summer. Many probably worked some and hung out on the beach; most traveled and had a great time. For UNCW ROTC (Reserve Officers Training Corps) Seahawk Battalion cadets, the summer was interesting, fun, and busy summer took on a whole new dimension. Cadets spent their "free" months in a variety of Army training events, including Basic Camp, Advanced Camp, Basic Airborne School, Air Assault School, and Northern Warfare School.

ROTC is a program aimed at commissioning second lieutenants in the United States Army, either Regular Army, active duty, Reserves, or National Guard. To achieve that commission, students can start during their freshman or sophomore year and take the four core courses prior to enrolling in the advanced courses. For juniors or other students who get a late start in the program, Basic Camp is designed to be a catch-up period.

Basic Camp is six weeks in length and is held at Fort Knox, Kentucky. Students learn basic military skills, including land navigation, rifle marksmanship, water survival and tactics. Besides military skills, students meet people from all 50 states and make many new friends. In addition to all that fun and learning, Basic Camp graduates earn approximately $700. UNCW had four graduates this summer: Pat Hartman, Gerry Hill, Cliff Swart, James Haynes. Pat Hartman said the following comments about Basic Camp.

"Basic Camp was a very interesting experience. Not only was it an interesting experience, but I met a wide variety of people from across the United States. All of the training I received was high speed, from Basic Rifle Marksmanship to firing the M203 grenade launcher. Some of the most thrilling training was high/low crawling and back crawling through a sand pit while live M60 rounds were being fired overhead and TNT was being detonated around me.

Australian rappelling was a high point. Going off of a forty foot tower face first got the heart beating fast. All of this training led to Bold Challenge, a five day adventure on leadership reaction, patrolling, and defensive fighting positions. If there is any advice I could give to a person going to Basic Camp, it is to have humor, positive attitude, and stay mentally alert."

Advanced Camp is an event that all ROTC cadets must participate in. Advanced Camp is six weeks long, pays approximately $550, and, for North Carolina, its purpose is to further refine learned military skills and leadership skills. It prepares cadets to return to their universities to instruct the next year camp attendees about important and necessary skills.

It also teaches cadets the many responsibilities of a newly commissioned lieutenant in the various branches, some of which include Aviation, Infantry, Military Police, and Field Artillery. The year after Advanced Camp is the final stage a cadet participates in before becoming a second lieutenant.

UNCW had fourteen Advanced Camp graduates this summer. Two of them are now commissioned, 2LT Michael Fields and 2LT Sheryl Galloway. The other graduates were Mickey Avalos, Darren Cox, Bruce Dale, Brian DeJoy, Ed Hartman, Brian Hill, Susan Jarvis, Dwight Kinlaw, Craig Moore, David Rouse, Matt Babel, and Cliff Wilkins.

Catch A Free Ride

BY AMY PETROCELLI

STAFF WRITER

As the sun sets and darkness lingers, there becomes a need for a safe means of travel across campus. This need can be fulfilled by the service of the Seahawk Shuttle, but students could lose the shuttle if it does not become better utilized in the future.

The purpose of the shuttle, which is provided by the campus police department and sponsored by the SGA, is to provide safe cross campus transportation. It is a preventive measure of sexual assault and is urged to be used in order to keep people from walking alone—especially females.

The shuttle is often used, however, according to officer Hunter Davis, ridership could be increased. "We'd like for people to use the shuttle as much as possible," he states. "If it is not used it potentially could be lost. I don't say this in a threatening way, but rather a positive way. Should the ridership increase and service is well liked by the university, there could possibly be two shuttles in the future."

You've probably seen the shuttle's flashing yellow light, which is an added feature this semester to increase visibility and in turn increase ridership.

The service of the Seahawk Shuttle is free upon presenting student ID. The shuttle goes anywhere on campus, but does not, however, go off campus.

One of the biggest complaints, according to officer Davis, is that the shuttle does not go where everyone wants it to go and when. It makes a continuous loop every hour on the hour starting at Hewlett Hall and ending in the apartment parking lot. Also, the shuttle is always at the library at midnight Sunday through Thursday.

The driver will follow this schedule as closely as possible. Going off schedule presents problems such as inconvenience to those expecting the shuttle at a certain time. Officer Davis parallels the service to that of a city bus rather than a taxi.

Lieutenant Lawson, who is in charge of the program, interviews and hires the drivers. She studies their background history and does everything possible to make sure she is putting good people on the job. Presently there are three drivers and all are students.

There has been talk of taking the service off campus as well, however, that is unlikely to happen.

According to Lieutenant Lawson, "Use of the shuttle off campus is out of our jurisdiction and presents a high liability for the police department as well as the university."

In cases where a student lives off campus, the driver will try to take the person as close to their home as possible without actually leaving campus.

Although the shuttle service is only available until 12 a.m., with the exception of Friday and Saturday, there are other services provided for safety. Security guards in the residence life area provide an escort service available between midnight and 2 a.m.. After 2 a.m., a police officer is available upon request to see you home safely.

Minorities cont'd . . .

Mr. Ralph Parker, director of Minority Affairs thinks this program attracts academically involved students to the University. Parker believes admissions is doing everything they can to recruit minorities. "The director of minority recruitment, Doug Johnson, is on the road now recruiting."

"Half the battle is sending in the applications and registering; the other half is retention," comments Parker. Students enter in the fall, yet they leave in the spring for whatever various reasons. The question forms: what will keep the minority students here?

Parker feels one major factor that would raise the comfort level of the black students would be if there were more black faculty. "Black professors represent positive role models to black students," explains Parker.

Unula McNeill, a black student agreed. "The lack of black professors here at UNCW severely hurt black students, because I feel that they represent our tomorrow what we can be."

Black students often complain about the social life here at UNCW. The majority of the white students go to the beach, but the black students do not go. Recently UNCW student Patricia O'Neal went to N. C. Central, a predominantly black college, for a weekend. "The atmosphere is totally different; [the students] social outside more than at UNCW."

When asked why the black students don't congregate outside here, one student Robin Nation said. "The atmosphere here at UNCW is not conducive to congregating outside." We need an environment that says, "We welcome you. Let's get together." Involvement is also important, which is lacking here.

Last semester the Black Student Union tried to have a Black Heritage Weekend. Activities planned for the whole weekend such as a pageant, a dance and a formal ball. However, participation was low, according to Tryphenia Cummings, a BSU member.

"The black organizations here at UNCW try to have some activities to induce involvement and increase the rather sparse social activities available to black students."

Iva Bosulough, Director of Minority Advising feels the purpose of college is to prepare students for the world. Yet, a social life is also important to students. The black students here seem to think a change is in order.

If more activities could be formed with total commitment from the organizations and total involvement from the black students, perhaps enrollment would increase. Parker acknowledges that minority enrollment is increasing, it's just that "the overall minority growth of UNCW overshadows any minority increase."

Good Ole Southern "True" Stories

There are many things about the South that tend to tickle my own personal fancy. Friendly people, a deep rooted love for baseball, and beautiful marshes all share a special place in my heart. There is no doubt, however, that my favorite thing about the South is the humorous stories that are told here.

I was fortunate enough to have been raised in a family whose main interests were in outdoor activities, and through years spent in duck blinds and country stores, I have managed to meet many Southerners with tales to tell.

There is no disputing the fact that Southern people are able to recreate happenings and magnify events far better than most. It seems that almost any time a local store or bar, an epidemic of storytelling breaks out. And of course with the stories come the lying.

Dogs play a big part in the stories of the South. Jerry Clower, a Southern story teller, once claimed to have a dog that was so smart he wouldn't bark when he ran across posted land. Another local deer hunter claimed to have a dog so fast that he could run around the house and kick dirt in his own face.

Working for a company which caters to the needs of farmers and since farming, hunting dogs and stories all seem to go hand in hand, I am fortunate enough to hear some very amusing lies.

A gentleman was recently stressing the point of how good his quail dog was and how he had trained it from a puppy. I was informed that when he was a boy, the dog wouldn't point quail as was expected but would circle the birds until they ran into a knothole of a tree. I've hunted quail over many fine pointers and knew that this was not considered proper behavior for a good dog. I made a fatal mistake and asked why the dog would do such a thing. "When I was a boy, my father only let me hunt with a single shot gun," he explained. "My dog would cover up the hole with his paw and let the birds out one at a time so I could shoot 'em."

When I felt the red creeping up my neck, I realized that I had been had.

One of my favorite dog stories comes from my own family lawyer. This seems appropriate since lying and lawyers have gone hand in hand since the establishment of the court system. Being an avid quail hunter, he was explaining to me about the fine art of shooting from the hip when I asked about his prize dog. Hours of dog talk later, he began to explain to me how he lost the dog one day while hunting. After looking for several hours, he decided that the dog would eventually come back home. "I looked for that dog for two weeks and never found hide nor hair," he told me. "It was the next year before I found out what happened to him."

As usual I bit the hook. "What did you find," I had to ask. "I found his bones on point and a quail's bones underneath him," he said with a perfectly straight face. I am considering changing lawyers.

Another favorite topic of the Southern story teller is the weather. One farmer was remarking on the heat and how it was affecting his farm. "It was so hot that I was plowing a field of popcorn and it all popped," he said. "Hell, with all that corn in the air, my mule thought it was snowing and froze to death."

Another gentleman claimed it was so hot that he saw a piece of firewood crawling across the yard looking for shade. My personal favorite is one which was told by my great grandfather who swore that it was so hot one summer afternoon that he saw a dog chasing a cat and they were both walking.

Stories are as common as tobacco in the South. It seems that when a person is brought up in classic Southern tradition, they are automatically a good story teller. With practice comes improvement and on any given Sunday afternoon one can rifle through small towns and by country stores to watch Southerners practice their art.

The beauty of it is that anyone can stop and listen. Well, knows, you might wish to be one about a dog of your own. When you finally do get to sit down and hear their humor, it will be obvious why I love their stories so.

By the way, have I ever told you about the deer dog I used to have...

Paying For Fun

When Kurt Lindstrom came to the UNCW campus yesterday it was not in the way his parents and friends must have envisioned his return to school before the night of April 14, 1989. That night a bullet from Roderick Stallings' gun lodged in Kurt's spinal cord, changing his life forever. Kurt rolled onto the campus grounds in his wheelchair, paralyzed from the waist down.

Really, all students' lives should be changed. We should learn from what happened and rid ourselves of that sense of immortality brought on by the innocence and naivete of our youth.

Few of us have lost a dear friend at this point in our lives, and those who have feel the exception with no great joy. Kurt's friends are quite lucky to still have him around. It could as easily have been any one of them.

Everyone was just out to have fun that night. Unfortunately, the Twinwood revelers who threw bottles and cans at passing cars had as strange a conception of fun as did the people in the black Peugeot who found humor in firing a pistol above the heads of the crowd (or so the story goes).

When you go out to party this fall and you're feeling rowdy, think of Kurt, who can't party anymore. If you are new here, keep in mind that youth does not equal immortality and that sometimes having a "good time" can exact a high price.

Oops!

Last week's Seahawk appears to have been produced during the day of the gremlins. Mistakes and flubs filled our unhalloved pages.

One of the more important screw-ups was the omission of Wes Coward's byline on the column about stupid questions. Another major blooper was in the Beach Bash article. The event is not only for freshmen and sophomores, but for upperclassmen as well. Please excuse the mess.

It seems that amidst the many other mistakes made on the last issue of the Seahawk one stands out....

In an apparent lapse of consciousness, we allowed the name of an editorial writer to be printed above the column questioning the purchase of a computer by our SGA President. While other columns and letters on page four are not necessarily the opinion of the Seahawk, the column under the Editorial header is.

The questions asked in that column look for answers that the Seahawk feels are important. The author of those questions is not a factor.

The Seahawk is open for rebuttal to any opinions stated in these pages. Any such rebuttal, if inarguable and right, shall stand as further proof that we, too, are fallible.

As I watch the Jim Bakker debacle unfold, I find myself moving beyond anger to a profound sense of tragedy. My anger has been centered around the abuse of spiritual power. It is the same kind of anger I find in myself at the abuse of political power or economic power, or even, personal power.

Once more the old belief that "power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely" is borne out.

The sadness comes as all the destruction that comes with the abuse of power is discovered and brought forth into public consciousness. What a waste of both money and human energy that were intended to enable human beings to develop their fullest spiritual and human potential!

We who observe the media show need to be careful in our projection of anger on such folk as the Bakkers. In our judgement of others more public and more powerful than we, it is easy to avoid the ethical shadows with which we may be all too content to live.

The essential issue is the frailty of our integrity.

The pressure at the university to achieve and to win acceptance by some particular group of our peers are two pressures that can lead us to make choices contrary to our behavior.

One of my deepest values and goals is the desire to live life truthfully. This means to claim neither more nor less for ourselves and about ourselves than we really are. It means that our public demeanor and our internal reality come close in matching. The only possibility for living life with integrity demands that we acknowledge the shadow parts of ourselves that we often do not like to admit.

I imagine that all of us are driven by needs and desires for some measure of success, influence and recognition by other people. What limits our drives to satisfy these needs are values and moral norms that are self-chosen and adopted as guides for living in our lives. To honor these values and moral norms in our daily living is to live with integrity.

Yet, all of us find ourselves in situations, almost daily, where we can be tempted to ignore these values in order to gain something that we feel is very important.

The pressure at the university to achieve and to win acceptance by some particular group of our peers are two pressures that can lead us to make choices contrary to our behavior.

After all, plagiarizing a paper isn't all that evil. Is it? Or taking just one hit of coke won't turn you into an addict. Will it? Or... you fill in the blanks with that little choice you are tempted to make that marks that small step across the boundaries of integrity for you.

Yes, spiritual leaders are as frail as political and corporate leaders. But our integrity, as critical as it is to any possible sense of well-being, is also very frail.

It is fine to feel the anger and the sadness about the abuse and the wasted resources of the RFL ministry. But whatever question or challenges those stories bring to your mind, ask them also of yourself.

Guard your integrity with great care and attentiveness. It is part of the foundation of your personal value system and a key to a sense of self-worth.

LETTERS

Seahawk editor:

Here are some friendly comments and hints to the student body from an old member of the Wilmington community:

1. You are attending one of the finest universities which grew from the embryo "Wilmington College" of several hundred students, to more than seven thousand this year.
2. Your desire to study here is a compliment to our community. We wish you success.
3. Conduct yourselves on and off campus in a manner that behoves a student of higher learning. Make this community and your home town proud of you.
4. Whatever your major study, do not minor in irresponsible party-poopin' that can damage our friendship.
5. The present size of UNCW generates a need for some sacrifice by both of us.
6. As you train to make a beneficial contribution to society and your own survival, seek a balance between your intense study and some needed "divertissement". Whatever relaxation you choose, be considerate of your student and community neighbors.

Good luck and best regards to the superb faculty and general staff.

Sincerely
Joseph D. Lewis

Dear Editor:

I'm writing in regard to last week's editorial concerning the purchasing of a computer by Jim Humphries. In reading the article, I found that some facts were left out.

To begin with, last year the Seahawk received a computer (bringing its total to four) that was for its use primarily, but also for the use of all other SGA funded student organizations, including the Atlantis. This was a condition for its purchase. The Atlantis has a computer to use in a suite of offices they share with the Seahawk. If it is unavailable they can use those in Cameron Hall or Randall Library, for they are not as bad as they were made out to be in the article. I know this is true for I use them regularly myself.

Jim is unable to use the computer in the SGA office as it is constantly used in all the paperwork for every organization the SGA funds. It keeps track of all their records as well as SGA's own. Also, he did not buy this new computer. The decision on obtaining one was made last year, and was approved by the Budget and Planning Committee and the Senate before he ever ran for office. It is not for his use solely, as the SGA Office Manager and Treasurer use it, and are integrating it into their present computer systems, which they say need to be updated.

The figures for the computer's purchase run around $2000, according to SGA records, but this includes the printer, which cost the SGA $460, a fact not stated.

One could be left with an impression that about $2800 was being spent on a computer system, and this is not the case. To connect the system to the Seahawk LaserWriter would not have been cheap either, for 50 or more feet of cable would have been required to do so.

Besides that, are Jim and Kirki (not Kirky) responsible for remembering exact prices of equipment that was ordered before they even took office, and was last discussed during budget hearing in April? The Atlantis received $7,110 for its budget then, and surely if they needed a computer for themselves one could, and may be in the future obtained.

Lastly, if the Seahawk wished to insinuate that Jim will use this computer for classwork, it must be admitted that Seahawk computers were put to that same use last year.

EDITORIAL REBUTTAL

Some of the items this student puts forth as fact are not true.

First, regardless of what the third paragraph of this letter states, the paperwork for Humphries' office is included in the workload for those other SGA office computers, and is paperwork he is not, by office, required to do.

Because he elects to do it does not make him heroic: if he hadn't, $2000 could have gone to any number other clubs, not just the Atlantis, who we used as an example last week.

Secondly, he did buy the computer. In an interview with the Seahawk in June, he reported having just put it on order, and was at that point ready to consider the printer.

The fourth paragraph alludes that the editorial tried to give false impressions of the cost of Humphries computer system—it did not. Even if read hurriedly, the editorial explicitly states: "It might be even marginally more forgivable if he had purchased a cheaper system, but at a total cost of over $2000, it was hardly pocket change." System by definition is the computer and printer. Even if the reader chose to overlook this, the word ideal should leave one with no doubt as our meaning.

And the cable which the writer mentions lists for $400—a far sight cheaper than $460!

But this is the crowding illusion he presents, that Humphries is not responsible for remembering the computer prices. Well, the elections were held March 17; the inauguration was March 31 (after which Humphries took office), and the budget hearings at which the computer was discussed were begun around April 24.

We'll let the readers decide.

Spike Bensonhurst: Fall Break or Bust

Well those magical four days in October are coming up soon and what are you going to do? What magical days you ask? In October? Why, Fall break is the magical week I speak of.

You're asking yourself, "what's so magical about fall break?" Well for one thing, most schools don't get fall break so it's a chance to go visit friends at other schools and rub a little vacation time in their face. Which is nice.

Second, it's a long weekend that breaks up the monotony of school that exists between Labor Day and Thanksgiving. It's four long, beautiful days where if you plan it right almost anything can be accomplished. So here are some of Spike's helpful hints on what to do with those four long, lovely, blissful days in October.

First of all start planning now. Not tomorrow. Today. If you wait you limit your opportunities and limit the amount of activities you can take in. Next, look at where all your friends live at home and find out what there is to do near where they live.

For instance, if your roommate lives in New Jersey (imagine that at UNCW) depending on what part you can easily go into New York City, Atlantic City, or Philadelphia. Any of these can provide an interesting, fun filled fall break that you will remember for a lifetime.

I know I will never forget the sights, smells, noises, and people of New York City (especially 42nd street. Have you ever seen a woman and a dog...? Never mind!). The great thing is that any of these places are only a short 12 hour drive away, and that ain't bad at all.

You say that New York City isn't your idea of a good time? Well keep hold of your shorts, Spike's not done yet. Football you say? It is football season. Well if football is more to your liking then plan out a trip to a pro or college game somewhere in the eastern United States.

Washington D.C. is only a six hour drive from Wilmington, Atlanta is only about seven. Tampa Bay is a nine hour drive, Miami is 13 hours away, and for you hard core roadtrippers New Orleans is merely 15 hours away. Plan this trip correctly and you can see the sights, take in the game, and be at your first class on Monday no problem.

Speaking of Florida, it's not very far away and it offers a cornucopia (I always knew one day I would use that word) of things for a young college student to do. Florida has all the beaches you could ever want, and with it's warmer climate, coral reefs, and fishing opportunities you can keep busy the whole break.

Another attraction in Florida is Disney World and Epcot Center in Orlando which I am told takes a few days at least to see it all. Remember there are many other attractions to see in Florida.

I'm not sure, but I think that Florida is also home to the largest ball of twine in the continental United States as well as the largest prairie dog in the world (or maybe that was Kansas, I'll let you know).

For those of you who think that roughing it is a black and white TV let me suggest a trip to the nearest video store and also to Kroger. Stock up on popcorn, chocolate bars, soda, and chips to go along with the latest releases (might I suggest a laxative also, just to make sure everything comes out OK) and sink down on the couch and put the old mind on cruise control until your friends return from seeing the world.

If this sounded like fun it's time you went and took a long look at yourself. Do you see eyes sprouting from your body like those potatoes that sat in your fridge a month to long?

There are only two things that limit what you can do in life or fall break. One is money and the other is imagination. If you don't have alot of money just get creative, and if you have alot of money get real creative! I hear that Borneo is real nice this time of year.

The Campus Police recommended a new way to store bicycles this week. Since implementing the new plan no thefts have been reported.

Home Video Pick of the Week
Heathers: Starring Winonna Ryder, Christian Slater

Where there snobby girls at your high school that treated everyone like dirt? Was there ever a big jack that tried to make your life miserable? Did you ever feel like you didn't fit in? Well then Heathers might be the movie for you.

Winonna Ryder (Beetlejuice) and Christian Slater (Tucker) star as a couple of homicidal teenagers who do away with the kids you always wanted to do away with yourself.

Veronica (Ryder) is one of the popular people and hangs out with the three most popular girls in the school, Heather 1, Heather 2, and Heather 3. But when a rebellious new kid catches Veronica's eye she soon turns on the Heathers, and starts getting rid of the snobby girls and jerky guys.

This movie probably isn't for everyone, but if you like dark comedy in the tradition of A Clockwork Orange you will find Heathers an interesting, and funny movie.

The Newsboys: Rocking for a Cause

Look out sinners, the news is out. "The Newsboys" Australia's rocking Christian band brought their music with a message to UNCW Wednesday night to 500 screaming fans.

The concert which was also a benefit for hunger with 50% of all the money earned going to The Food Distribution Center of Wilmington. "The Newsboys" opened their set with a very upbeat song called Listen for the Shout off of their first album Read All About It. They then moved through other energetic songs such as Hold On Tight and I Got Your Number to a very responsive crowd of young people who seemed very familiar with this relatively unknown Aussie band.

It was very refreshing to see a band that was clean cut with a positive message that could still get down on the stage. From lead singer John James, to bass drummer Peter Parlier, to bass player Sean Taylor, and lead guitarist George Parkis each band member was very talented and put on a great show where the parents not only brought the kids to the show, but stayed for the music too.

The Food Distribution Center which distributes food directly to those in need, and also through "Mother Hubbards Cupboard" and the Thanksgiving Basket program is located at 719 N. 4th street. The FDC is always looking for new volunteer helpers. So if you have the time drop by and help out someone who needs it.

When you party, remember to...

It's as easy as counting from 1 to 10.

Guests:

1. Know your limit—stay within it.
2. Know what you're drinking.
3. Designate a non-driving driver.
4. Don't let a friend drive drunk.
5. Call a cab if you're not sober—or not sure.

Hosts:

6. Serve plenty of food.
7. Be responsible for friends' safety.
8. Stop serving alcohol as the party winds down.
9. Help a problem drinker by offering your support.
10. Set a good example.

Film

E. Allen Ray

Kickboxer: Starring Jean Claude Van Damme (that is one person)

Rating: As a movie 3 out of a possible 10.

Rating: For the Karate scenes 8 1/2 out of a possible 10.

If you want to see a serious film that will challenge your intellect, broaden your awareness, and teach you a little something about yourself don't go see Kickboxer. If on the other hand you want to see your average no plot, no acting, lot of grunting karate flick you have come to expect from Jean Claude Van Damme then Kickboxer won't offend you to much.

The plot of Kickboxer is pretty standard. Kurt (Van Damme) goes to Thailand with his older brother Eric who is the American heavyweight kickboxing champion to fight the Thai champ Tong Po. When Eric is paralyzed by Tong Po Kurt decides to train with an old Thai master to avenge his brother. Gee, I wonder if he is going to win?

The characters are so bad that you find yourself laughing at the dramatic (sort of) moments, and feeling like crying at the jokes. The worst thing of all is that Kurt's brother is so obnoxious even in a wheel chair you don't feel sorry for him.

Naturally Kurt has a girl friend and when the bad guys want to take his mind off the fight what do they do? They kidnap her and the bad guy Tong Po rapes her, and if that's not bad enough they really get personal when they go so far as to try to kill his masters dog.

This was a bad movie, but there is one redeeming quality. Jean Claude Van Damme is probably the most impressive martial artist to come along since Bruce Lee.

He combines amazing speed with massive muscularity and unreal flexibility to do things that Chuck Norris only has dreams about. His acting has improved slightly over his last few movies (Bloodsport, Cyborg, and Black Eagle), but he still seems out of place trying to deliver his lines with a lot of credibility.

Go see this movie without any expectations and you might even enjoy it. Well, maybe.

Relentless: Judd Nelson, Leo Rossi, Robert Loggia.

Rating: 6 1/2 out of a possible 10.

Homicidal killer. Eager young detective. Series of bizarre murders where the victims participate in their own demise. Sound like an interesting movie? Well it almost was.

Relentless is the story of an emotionally troubled young man named Buck Arthur (Nelson). In the first scene we see Buck getting a letter of rejection from the Los Angeles police department because he failed the psychological exam to get into the police academy.

Buck is driven by the memory of his over demanding father who was a policeman, and pushed Buck to be one from his early childhood. The combination of his hatred for his father and the rejection from the police drive Buck to find a way to prove he is better than the police, and satisfy his need to please his father.

Enter Det. Deits who was just promoted to detective and is out to save the world today, not tomorrow. Det. Deits (Rossi) is an ex-New York cop who finds the west coast a little laid back, and his new partner Det. Malloy (Loggia) more interested in real estate prices than in solving the string of murders they are assigned.

This is one of those movies that could have been a lot better than the way it turned out. Judd Nelson is semi-believable as a ruthless killer who feels he is helping his victims find peace by killing them.

Leo Rossi turns out to be the good guy for a change after playing a low life in every movie he has been in (the instigator of the rape in "The Accused"). Robert Loggia has by far the most interesting character of the movie, but most of the focus is on Det. Deits or Buck and Loggia doesn't get the screen time he deserves.

The most deceiving thing about this movie is the title "Relentless". The pace of "Relentless" is anything but relentless, and the movie seemed about 15 minutes too long. Good characters, intriguing plot, but could have been a lot more.

Parenthood: Starring Steve Martin, Mary Steenburgen, Rick Moranis.

Rating: 8 1/2 out of a possible 10.

One Family, three generations, six separate nuclear families which are all dysfunctional candidates for the Oprah Winfrey show. Sound a little confusing? Well it is. Sort of.

Parenthood is a light hearted look at a not so traditional American family. No little pink houses with white picket fences and a dog in the back yard for this movie. What we have here is average real-to-life families with true to life problems and conflicts. The movie starts a bit slow, and it's kind of confusing to keep up with who all the kids belong to, but don't get discouraged. Parenthood isn't about children or raising them it's about being a parent.

Steve Martin turns out a great performance as he and his siblings try to cope with raising their children despite interference from their parents and their parents' parents. This is definitely a family movie that everyone will enjoy.

Lots of laughs, a few tears, and a good feeling when you leave the theatre. You can't ask for much more from a movie.

Pizza Hut Franchising on U.S. Campuses

(CPS) — Pizza Hut pizzas soon may be available just outside dorms on as many as 450 campuses nationwide, leaving off-campus businesspeople piping hot.

Marriott Food and Services Management, which runs food facilities at 450 colleges and schools, said in late August it has signed an agreement with Pizza Hut to operate Pizza Hut kiosks directly on campus grounds.

Marriott installed a similar program — in which students can charge special 6-inch pizzas with their meal cards — for Domino's at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill last winter. As a result, one local off-campus pizza parlor, Howie's, folded, while another, Gumbly's, saw its share of the UNC pizza market fall from 45 percent to 10 percent.

"This is not an operation that serves the students' academic needs," complained Dick Luna, president of the Chamber of Commerce in Davis, Calif., where Marriott recently put up a Pizza Hut kiosk at the University of California-Davis. "It is a direct retail operation."

Ali Khashaghi, owner of Mountain Mike's restaurant in Davis, reported that half his customers are students, and expects the on-campus pizza kiosks will diminish his sales.

"It appears the Pizza Hut name and kiosk are attracting to the university Union area students who used to go downtown to eat," added Dr. Stephen H. Peterson of Central Missouri State University (CMSU) in Warrensburg, where Marriott has been testing the kiosk idea.

Students do seem to love the idea.

For instance, Pizza Hut sold 1200 pizzas — enough for one of every eight students — the first day its kiosk was open at CMSU. There are now two kiosks on campus.

At George Washington University, another test site, staffers projected selling 800 to 1000 pizzas a day. Within two weeks, Pizza Hut was selling that many pizzas just during the lunch hour. Now GW is selling about

The kiosks cost one-tenth the amount needed to build a traditional Pizza Hut restaurant.

1500 pizzas a day and has just added a second kiosk, said Julius Green, director of auxiliary services.

"The pizzas are super popular," said John David Morris, president of GW's student association. "There is always a line a mile long at lunch."

At most campuses, students can use their meal card to "charge" pizzas. For example, the meal program at GW includes 10 meals a week, plus $200 per semester that students can use at any location on campus that sells food.

Brian Reser, a CMSU sophomore, says using his meal card is easy. "It's nice not to have to use cash," he said. Pizza Hut also finds it nice. The kiosks cost one-tenth the amount needed to build a traditional Pizza Hut restaurant, but can generate up to one-half of the sales of a restaurant, said Marriott spokeswoman Kathy Boyle.

The "traditional" small pizza places that have always catered to students, of course, still must cope with "traditional" costs, including taxes that campus ventures, by virtue of being nonprofit firms, don't have to pay.

Off-campus business groups have been mounting legal challenges at a quickening pace in recent years as colleges start selling computers, pizza and even pharmaceuticals in competition with local companies.

In April, a California appeals court, for example, ruled the state's 107 community college bookstores would have to stop selling books not used in their classes because the schools, which don't have to charge students taxes, were competing unfairly with off-campus stores.

Georgetown University and the universities of Colorado and Utah, among others have been sued by angry local businesspeople for allegedly unfairly competing with them during 1989.

On the other hand, colleges forcefully keep local firms from selling on their campuses. Loyola University of New Orleans banned a local pizza parlor from advertising on campus in March, 1988. In September, 1988, the University of Miami adopted strict leafletting policy to keep sales flyers off campus.

The Marriott deal with Pizza Hut, Davis's Luna claimed, is more of the same. "It seems that the university is getting more and more involved in retail activities which aren't fair competition," he said.

Katie Scully, owner of Heroes in Warrensburg, said the kiosks at the CMSU campus haven't hurt her business, which serves a variety of burgers, steaks and Mexican food.

"However, if I owned a pizza place I wouldn't be very happy," she said.

GW's Morris, who has eaten "30 or 40 pizzas," doesn't believe that it's unfair competition. "I go there because the price is right and it's convenient. It doesn't take me away from other businesses."

NAFTAT Wants To Bury The 1960's

(CPS) — Even as the commercialized remembrances of the 1969 Woodstock music festival finished failing miserably, the National Association For The Advancement of Time called for a "Boycott of the Past Week."

"We're getting petty fed up with baby boomers reliving their childhood in prime time," complained NAFTAT President Bruce Elliott, 27, of Los Angeles. "Meanwhile, all other loves are brushed aside as irrelevant. We want to end the sixties in our lifetime."

"The voice of today is being buried under an avalanche of retrospection," Elliott maintained. When four out of five pop radio stations play oldies, when topical theater is pushed aside for a revival of "Hair," something is wrong."

Drug Testing Judged Unconstitutional

(CPS) — On the eve of the football season a local Boulder, Colo., judge has deemed the University of Colorado's drug-testing program unconstitutional, and has ordered the school to stop testing athletes immediately.

The decision by District Judge Joseph Bellipanni, spurred by an American Civil Liberties Union lawsuit on behalf of CU athletes, probably won't affect other schools, drug-testing proponents said.

"That has no immediate effect on NCAA testing," declared Frank Uryasz, director of sports sciences for the National Collegiate Athletics Association, which tests athletes at championship tournaments. "We plan to continue until some precedent-setting litigation tells us not to," he said.

"We have no thoughts on making any changes," affirmed Dean Billick, associate athletic director at the University of Pittsburgh, where all football and basketball players are subject to regular urine tests.

CU's program, in which athletes take eye test, and if they fail that, urine tests, amounts to unreasonable search and seizure, Bellipanni ruled.

CU was using a rapid-eye screening device to make the tests less intrusive, but Bellipanni called them "an intrusion without purpose..." It is wholly unable to indicate with any measure of validity whether a person has been using any of the proscribed drugs."

The NCAA is four of five against challenges to its testing program. A Santa Clara County Superior Court judge issued a permanent injunction last summer, allowing Stanford University athletes to compete without taking drug test.

But in separate lawsuits, athletes from Louisiana, State and Northeastern universities and from the universities of Miami and Washington lost.

On the high school level, two-thirds of the students at Homewood-Flossmoor High School outside of Chicago will have to take random drug tests, after the school board voted August 15 to require tests for participants in all interscholastic activities, including athletics and clubs.

CU's program, in which athletes take eye test, and if they fail that, urine tests, amounts to

Sex Out And Gambling In

(CPS) — Nassau Community College students won't be going to pay bars or chatting with prostitutes any more in their human sexuality course.

The Nassau County (NY) Board of Supervisors threatened to reject the school's budget, and thereby delay the start of the fall semester, unless the homework was modified.

Also nixed from the class were assignments such as masturbating, taking a bubble bath, and viewing 80 slides of male and female genitalia. Students will get to see a film that explicitly portrays sexual intercourse.

This isn't the first time that such "sex" courses have gotten a rise out of schools' governing boards.

Last year at Villanova University, a Catholic school in Pennsylvania, a religious studies professor was criticized for allowing a student to show a sexually explicit video in a "Christian marriage in the Modern World" course.

And in 1986 Cerritos college in California dropped two sex-relationship courses after a debate about whether the course material was "appropriate."

Other annual courses already have raised eyebrows this year. The University of Nevada-Reno unveiled the first gambling institute July 1 where students can eventually earn undergraduate minor degrees.

The program is in response to the growing interest in gambling, with many states getting into gambling to generate government revenue.

San Francisco State University students this fall will be able to take a course titled "Homelessness and Public Policy," in which they can live on the streets for a while.

Default Rates Rise Nationwide

(CPS) — New, hastily imposed federal rules have pitched many campus financial aid offices into a crisis in recent weeks, dramatically slowing the process of delivering Stafford Loans to students, financial aid directors around the country say.

The crisis could keep some students from getting their loans until after their tuition deadlines have passed, the directors add.

"Students aren't liking it well," said Greeley Myers, aid director at New Mexico State University (NMSU).

The rules, designed to try to minimize the student loan default rate, require campuses to counsel students taking out their first Stafford Loan about how to repay the loan.

"Some (students) have already been through this with their lender," Myers noted. "Here's one more round of bureaucratic paperwork."

"I already pretty much knew all that they told me," affirmed Daryl Fambrough, a NMSU freshman, after a counseling session.

Aid directors like Myers say they simply didn't have time to implement the rules efficiently. The announcement that the rule would be in place for this semester — instead on next spring or fall, as most assumed — was published in the Federal Register August 24, leaving aid officials scrambling to find time and staffings to counsel students just as students began returning to school.

"I'm finding it overwhelming and depressing, especially when I think of having to do this every semester," said Baylor University's David Bond.

Anticipated bottlenecks — where borrowers are stuck without money to pay for food, books and tuition until they get their loan, which they can't do until they're properly counseled — haven't appeared, at least not yet.

"There could be some delays (in paying tuition), but the university will take a pretty lenient posture," promised Lenton Clark, aid director at the University of Arkansas.

Most schools have resorted to offering group sessions several times a day, using a video to warn students of their repayment obligations and the consequences of defaulting.

Though using a video has eased some staffing burdens, aid officers had to identify who was taking out a Stafford Loan for the first time, a task that called for combing through records by hand.

"This whole process is slowing down our personnel from giving our students help," Baylor's Bond charged.

Arkansas officials didn't even try to tag beginning borrowers.

"It's almost impossible to identify new borrowers, so we're making everyone (who takes out a Stafford Loan) go through it," Clark said.

The counseling dictum is part of a multi-pronged attack, first unveiled June 1, aimed at punishing schools that do bad job of collecting loans.

Under the Stafford, or "guaranteed" loan program, students actually borrow money from banks, but the government promises to pay the banks if the students fail to repay their loans.

As the default rate has grown, the government has taken enormous losses. This year alone, it will pay banks $1.8 billion to cover bad student loans, or about 37 cents for every dollar Congress appropriated for student aid.

Past efforts to get more students to repay their loans have helped. On August 10, the US Dept. of Education, which oversees most federal education programs like Stafford Loans, reported the default rate fell four percent, to 17 percent, from 1987 to 1988.

The command to counsel students grew from a belief that some students may default simply because they are unaware of their borrowing responsibilities.

But the new anti-default rules have a tougher side. They demand that some 1,803 schools that have default rates higher than 20 percent immediately formulate new loan collection programs.

Starting in October, 1,040 schools with rates above 30 percent must wait to release loan funds to first-time borrowers until those students have gone to class for 30 days.

Beginning in January 1991, schools with default rates above 60 percent and those above 40 percent that don't cut their rates at least 5 points a year, could be booted from the guaranteed student loan program altogether.

Meanwhile, the Education Dept. figures the new counseling effort can save $44 million if it cuts the default rate by just 1 percent.

Aid officers are willing to help. They complain, however, the government didn't give them enough time to install counseling procedures.

The National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators (NASFAA), a trade group based in Washington, DC, lobbied for a delay. Under the Higher Education Act, it pointed out, new regulations affecting the 1989-90 school year were supposed to have been published by last December.

Loan counseling, though, is a "big-ticket item," explained Roberta Dunn, the department's deputy assistant secretary for student financial assistance. "The secretary is encouraging everyone to do their best, but we have some sympathy for the schools."

"There's no evidence to show that a particular form of counseling is more effective than other forms," said NASFAA director Dallas Martin.

"People are either going to pay back loans or they're not," asserted Baylor's Bond. "It might keep a few (from defaulting), but I can't see how it would have a huge effect."

Baylor has a default rate of just 3.6 percent, but Bond takes no credit for the scarcity of deadbeat borrowers. "It's nothing in particular that we're doing."

Seahawks prepare for Invitational

BY TAMMY CONNELLY
SEAHAWK SPORTSWRITER

A new era has begun for Cross-Country at UNCW this year. With the construction of the Harold Greene Track and Field Complex, Coach Bill Cason was brought to UNCW with the task of building a solid Cross-Country and Track program.

Last year was Cason's first at UNCW and although numbers were few, the Cross-Country team ran better than it ever had before.

Coach Cason has brought 35 new freshmen into the program this year, building a team of over 40 members. Despite the team's youth, Cason says, "The team has a lot of talent." He believes the team will finish much higher in the conference than in previous years, and the work towards this goal has already begun.

The team's first official practice was held on August 20. Since then, the team has met virtually every afternoon at 4:00 for practice. They also added early-morning training four times each week. Workouts vary between long runs (10 miles for men; 7-8 miles for women) and speed work on the track.

The team will also be lifting weights and swimming to improve muscle fitness. This type of training schedule allows for greater stamina and speed.

All this work is done with the sole idea of reaching the team goal, which is to be the best team in UNCW history.

Coach Cason emphasizes that each athlete must set his own personal goals and strive to attain them for this to become a reality. Senior Sarah Harris is following up on this idea.

"If I don't attend graduate school, this could be my last year competing in college athletics. I want to reach my goals before I graduate," says Harris.

On Saturday, September 1, the team ran its first time trial. The length of the time trial was two miles. The top male runner finished in 9:13.6, while the top female finished at 11:40.4.

Training for competition is often a heavy stress load according to the athletes. The pressures from classes and sport can wear on an athlete both mentally and physically. Many of the team members felt lucky to be on the team.

Don Scott agreed saying, "It can get really rough when pressures are hitting from all sides. The team serves as a built-in support group for me."

The team has a busy schedule this season. Practices will continue throughout the year for both Cross-Country and Track. On September 16, the Cross-Country team faces its first real competition. The Seahawk Invitational will be held on the UNCW athletic field Saturday morning.

Teams from N.C. State, UNC-Chapel Hill, and ECU will be in attendance. Twelve teams will be competing in all, with 200 runners on the field. This is the second year that the Seahawk Invit. has been held at UNCW and Coach Cason is sure it's going to be big. Come out and support the home team on September 16.

UNCW Athletes to Take Test

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

A new law is coming to UNCW, a law that will enrage some and be cheered by others and regardless of what side of the issue you're on, it will come. Mandatory drug testing is invading the Seahawk Athletic Department in the Fall of 1990.

President C.D. Spangler strongly urged all university Chancellors in the N.C. University system to adopt a testing procedure for all athletes involved in the intercollegiate level of play. In his address to the Board of Trustees in Raleigh, Spangler outlined that these chancellors should appoint a committee to form the rules and regulations, (in penalties) of such a mandatory drug testing procedure. Chancellor Wagoner would be responsible for the duty at our university, but as of now he hasn't appointed a committee. These tests would be the first of its nature to hit the campus. Presently, the university conducts drug testing in the disciplinary action of students caught in possession of a substance.

According to Dean of Students Pat Leonard, "The drug test is just one of several steps taken by the University and Health Center in an evaluation of a student's possible background of substance abuse. It (the test) is for counseling purposes solely and only the student and the counselor know the results of the test." Students found to have a drug-related past receive more guidance through one on one sessions conducted by the Health and Wellness Center. Leonard could possibly be put on such an anti-drug committee due to her experience with troubled youth yet she has some reservations on the drug policy.

"I have a problem singling out a specific group to be tested just because they play sports. However, I suppose if we are paying them a scholarship to play for us, then we have a responsibility to see that they are clean. They have, in that case, an obligation to us in that same respect." She not ready to reject the program either, "I haven't seen the proposed program so I can't evaluate its merit." These are others who strongly support this new drug legislation.

Athletic Director Bill Brooks feels the testing would be a plus for the athletic department. "I support the idea and I'll tell you two reasons why: 1) All teams who make post-season tournaments like the NCAA are going to be tested. So why risk losing a couple of players for the playoffs and occur embarrassment to ourselves just because we didn't test them beforehand. 2) I think it will act as a deterrent to person who are thinking of trying drugs. When questioned if the testing would be an infringement on a student's right to privacy, Brooks said firmly, "If a player wants to participate in collegiate sports he has to follow the rules and regulation of the game."

The biggest question that confronts the university will be where the cost of such an adventure would come. Taking the average testing cost of $45 to some 300 plus athletes for the purpose of screening them 3 times a year would amount to an grand total of $40,500. The administration is not sure where the funding would come from. "I don't think the student body should pay from their tuition costs," said Pat Leonard. This is certainly will be one of the major points and duties of the new drug committee will have to decide.

The new drug testing is met with approval by the coaching staff. Both Head basketball coaches Robert MacPherson and Marilyn Christoph support this measure. "I think drug testing is very fair and eventually after testing becomes common you won't have to raise questions about the issue. People will come to accept the idea. We are doing everything we can to protect our athletes," said Christoph.

Regardless what your opinion is on the drug testing controversy, one thing is for certain. Mandatory drug testing is coming to the UNCW campus and its impact on the campus will be felt.

called and some they should have left alone," remarked junior forward Rony Smith.

A couple calls in the game were highly questionable, one leading to the only score of the match. The Dukes had an indirect kick and the Hawks fullbacks pulled up trying to draw the JMU's forwards offside. It appeared they achieved this goal but the referee saw it differently.

With suddenly an open goal to fire on JMU cashed in as goalie John Pinter didn't stand a chance. After the goal the Hawks tried valiantly to muster a score but the stubborn Duke defense held firm. They managed to weather the final aggressive Hawk charge and take home a victory.

This was the second time the Seahawks were blanked and with 16th ranked George Mason hanging around the corner the Hawks need to generate some offensive power if they are to compete. The next Hawk's home game is today at 4:00 at Brooks field. They take on Atlantic Christian in a non-league match. The Hawks are still trying to taste the victory of success and capture its first win of the season.

Seahawks score, remain winless

JMU drops Hawks, 1-0

BY PATRICK FOWLER
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

If anyone tells you that soccer is not a contact sport then they weren't at Brooks field when the Hawks tangled with the Dukes of James Madison. The Saturday night wrestlers would have had a tough time.

The Hawks trying to rebound from an opening day loss to the Charleston Cougars (2-0), elevated their play to a level its fans were accustomed to seeing. The Hawks aggressive style, good ball movement, and all out hustle played dividends of numerous scoring opportunities in both halves and the overtime. It would all go for naught as the Hawks fell, 1-0.

Despite the loss many good things came out of the contest. The biggest plus being a drastic change from last Monday's performance. The green machine was communicating with one another. They were alive with talk and it benefitted their passing game greatly. The Hawks also have finally found a leader on the field. The field general is a new recruit from Clydebank, Scotland and the heart of the defense.

His name is Paul Cairney and he has brought a definite European twist to the Seahawk game. Commanding the troops with a great presence of mind on the field, Cairney directs traffic from the forwards to the fullbacks. He is also a patient player who is rarely sucked in by the passer, and makes the ball handler play him instead of vice-versa.

"I expected to gain leadership with Paul, he's that type of player," said coach Jackie Blackmore. "It really hurt our squad when he went out in the first half and I admire his effort playing hurt the rest of the game."

Cairney, Shawn Wallace, and David Allen sustained injuries during the contest adding to the list of walking wounded for the Seahawks. Junior standout defenseman Marc Rose hurt his ankle early in the week and had to miss Friday's match.

"We've had a lot of injury problems recently and the guys who filled in did a super job under the circumstances," said Blackmore.

The game was very contestly challenged with high kicks, elbows, jersey holding, and take-downs that much too often went unnoticed by the officials.

Dave Allen's injury to his right quadracep was so painful that he was helped off the field on the shoulders of two teammates. The game was rough and brutal at times.

Mason tops UNCW, 4-1

BY SUZIE SHERFIELD
SPORTSWRITER

With five players out due to injuries, the UNCW men's soccer team battled the George Mason Patriots to no avail.

The Hawks are now 0-3 as of Sunday's afternoon game against George Mason, ranked 14th in the nation. The Patriots took the Seahawks out with a final score of 4-1.

"Even though the score was 4-1, it was a 2-1 game," says Alex Sibinovic.

After the Patriots' seemingly effortless victory over East Carolina University Saturday (final score, 6-0), they appeared almost lackadaisical at the start of the first half and naturally, the Seahawks picked up on it. But a skillful play by Jim McManus and Chris George nearly scoring early on for the Hawks brought the overly confident George Mason team back to reality.

From that moment of awakening, the Patriots put themselves one step ahead throughout most of the game though the determined Hawks stayed right on their heels playing their best game yet this season. "A lot of freshman grew after this one," continued Sibinovic. "Chris Parks (mid fielder) earned his wings."

However, momentum was lost in the final minutes of the game allowing the Mason two more goals. But coach Jackie Blackmore was not let down, "I think we played really hard and I'm not disappointed at all."

It is doubtful the Seahawks will be up against a team of George Mason's caliber again this season. Coach Blackmore feels this game was a definite learning experience for the Hawks in that both organization and confidence were amplified. Although the Hawks were defeated, "I was proud of them anyway," said Blackmore.

Rugby- Seahawk style

BY LAURA SPANIER
SEAHAWK SPORTSWRITER

Rugby. What is it? It has been a recognized UNCW Club sport for the past ten to twelve years. It is a field game derived from soccer consisting of fifteen players per team that work together to push the ball over the goal line. The game itself is derived from football, therefore much of the rules of the game.

The team has a new addition, Coach Junie. Coach Junie is an enthusiastic man with a renowned background. He has worked years with the Eastern Select Side Region and coached European based team in Wales. They went far in their division.

Now if you never played rugby, here is a simple game plan.

The object is to move the ball forward by running, kicking, or passing it backwards continuously without any breaks. The eventually goal is to cross the ball over the goal line. Sounds simple enough?

Captain Rollin Mackel said, "UNCW rugby is a sports game to bring individuals together through athletics and fun." He went on to express that the team's goal is to achieve state ranking and to win.

The UNCW rugby team has their games scheduled every Saturday at one o'clock against North Carolina affiliated A. C. C. teams and the Older Men's Clubs. The first game is scheduled at home this Saturday against Cape Fear Men's Team of Wilmington.

If you are interested in joining the team; they are still looking for people. Ask to talk to Coach Junie between 4-6 on Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday. They be practicing on Brooks Field next to the baseball field. Captain Rollin Mackel wanted to stress that, "There are no A or B teams, no stars, everyone plays. You come out, you play!"

UNCW rugby members play the ball out of scrum. The club team is one of several teams available on campus. The team practices Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday afternoons from 4-6pm. The team is coached by man known as Junie who directed European leagues before settling in Wilmington. The team is always interested in acquiring new members for the squad, all interested parties are asked to come to one of the practices. Rugby is well-known in Europe but it has yet to draw large American crowd from its national pastime of baseball. The sport is starting to catch on major college campus campuses around the nation. ## Houzer attends NBA camp

Larry Houzer will be given a try-out with the Dallas Mavericks of the NBA sometime next week. The Alabama center, and former AII-CAA player will not go overseas to due money offers conflicts. Houzer was drafted by the Penniscola, Florida team in the CBA earlier this year. UNCW will host the 5th Annual Seahawk Track and Field Invitational this weekend. Teams from Carolina, State, Duke, and ECU will descend on Green's Track and Field Complex to wage battle against one another.

Leading scorer, Mike McGinty returns for the Seahawks Water Polo team this year as the players gear up for the '89-90 season. There first and only home match of the season will be on the 30th of this month in the Seahawk Natatorium.... The UNCW Women's Volleyball team is 3-1 on the season. UNCW already leads in 5 out of 6 of the team statistics and 4 out of 5 of the individuals category. The Hawks have a tougher schedule this season playing power teams like Carolina and participating in more Invitationals. They acquired this rigorous schedule due to the teams success in achieving an 30-3 mark last year.... The women's golf squad will try to reach the NCAA Tournament for the first time in its history. The Hawks started their season off last weekend when they competed in the Longwood Invitational, Coach Lea Dudley will count on the efforts of senior Paula Broszowski, who has a 77.20 stroke average, to pace the Hawks to victory.... The Swim Team had a good crop of recruits this season. The Hawks were very low in numbers regarding their women's program but acquired 18 new members over the summer to the squad. The men's team also improved its ranks with 10 more swimmers.... Homer's tickets are still on sale for the upcoming October 20th invasion of the swarm to Track Coliseum. The game starts at 7:30 pm.

Youth, experience has tennis on the rise

Where are they now?

Where are all of those so-called (probably self-proclaimed) tennis experts who forecasted, as little as a year ago, the doom and destruction of American tennis?

Were they stockbrokers, moonlighting as tennis analysts? And would the mere mentioning of October 20, bring about horrifying flashbacks?

American tennis, in case you haven't noticed, is thriving. New, youthful exuberance has blended majestically with the McEnroe generation to form an almost unbeatable tandem.

After a year's sabbatical from the Davis Cup competition, where we were relegated to qualifying round, the USA squad rebounded—coming within two points of hosting this year's final against Sweden.

Not bad for a team playing without the quintessential Davis Cup performer, John McEnroe, and with two player's who are basically novices to the rudiments of international competition, notably Andre Agassi and Brad Gilbert.

McEnroe, the all-time American leader in Davis Cup wins, was forced to skip the event due to medical reasons. His replacement, Gilbert filled in remarkably, winning both of his matches, although the second was merely a formality as Germany had already secured the tie by winning three matches.

More currently, two American men are semifinalists at the U.S. Open, the last of the Grand Slam events. And a third, Ivan Lendl, is an American wannabe.

Agassi, a semifinalist for the second consecutive year, faces Lendl, the same man who beat him last year.

Jimmy Connors—who epically slayed Sweden's Stefan Edberg in straight sets, would have made the semi's, but he lost to countryman Agassi in the quarterfinals.

The same was true of French Open champion Michael Chang, who lost in the round of 16 to fellow patriot Tim Mayotte. Mayotte then was steamrolled by Lendl in three devastatingly quick sets in the quarters.

Aaron Krickstein, he of the Nick Bollettieri run-around-your-backhand-at-all-costs-and-smash-forehands-till-you-drop school of tennis, reached the final four for the first time in his career. To do so, he defeated, or rather outlasted a nutritionally depleted Jay Berger.

Yes, McEnroe, a four-time winner of the Open, was sent packing after a disappointing second round performance, but he did manage to team with Aussie Mark Woodford to win the men's doubles. And who did the best in the final? None other than the Davis Cup doubles pair of Ken Flach and Robert Seguso.

The resurgence of American tennis is not surprising; the momentary lack of success a few years ago was. The reservoir had simply run dry.

But there is a new well being dredged, and somewhere underneath all that churned up soil, lies a group of out-of-work forecasters.
